Celebrating 100 Years of Coeducation

SPECIAL SECTION 1990-91 ANNUAL REPORT
A SAD FAREWELL TO THE WASHINGTON COLLEGE FILM
FICTION BY 1991 SOPHIE KERR WINNER

Education By Tradition

In a recent discussion I heard it said that Washington College was somewhat deficient in its lack of traditions. I presumed this to mean rites and rituals along the rather trivial lines of freshman beanies and conceded that some customs lend a sense of continuity to life on campus. But I did not feel that Washington College was lacking in traditions. I think this issue of the Washington College Magazine helps prove that point.

According to Webster's, tradition is first of all "the handing down of information, beliefs, and customs by word of mouth or by example from one generation to another without written instruction." Suddenly it seemed quite profound to me that in an age where information can be an electronic impulse, transmitted in a nanosecond, we still learn the lessons of tradition in a way that pre-dates language by example.

This fall Washington College kicks-off a year-long celebration of one of its most significant traditions: the education of women alongside men. We should be most proud that this traditional belief in the intellect, ability, and keen spiritedness of young women has been passed down for a century. And primarily by example.

In researching her story on the history of coeducation, Sue De Pasquale found no record of the specific accomplishments of Bertha Stiles, the first woman on the Washington College faculty, or of those first female recipients of their bachelor's degrees. But we can know something of their impact on the intellectual life of the College by reading about professors Margaret Horsley, Gerda Blumenthal, and Esther Dillon, and then-student Christine Olpin Pakon in the 1950s and 60s. They are all part of the proud continuum of tradition here at Washington College and we are still learning by their example.

Another, newer, tradition flourishes here at Washington College thanks to the generosity and example of honorary degree recipient Sophie Kerr. Her gift now inspires a tradition of excitement about good writing on campus, passed on, not only by Sophie Kerr "winners" but by the enthusiasm and creativity of our students, faculty, and visiting writers who all share ideas thanks to her legacy. Robert J. Thompson's story on page 22 proves that the tradition is alive and well.

Sadly, we had to report in these pages the death of an important symbol on our campus landscape. The venerable Washington College Elm succumbed to Dutch elm disease and is gone. By tradition we had celebrated under this great tree and had embraced it as a living symbol that our school was rooted and tied to some of history's most distinguished events. This was a seedling of the elm tree in Cambridge, Massachusetts, under which George Washington had taken command of the American Army.

Even so, the death of the Elm is not the death of tradition at Washington College. Though the tree is gone, our veneration for the College's distinguished past thrives. We will mark it with ceremonies but most importantly we will celebrate it by example.

A Tribute To Leaders Of Today And Tomorrow

You will be remembered as the class that made the sun shine," President Charles H. Trout told the 203 members of the Class of 1991 and 22 master's degree candidates on their graduation day. In a bold move that cool and cloudy May morning, Trout had aborted the commencement set-up in Cain gymnasium. His gamble paid off as the sun broke through precisely 68 minutes into a ceremony that paid tribute to the positive contributions made to society by students, alumni, board members and others not so closely connected to the College.

This Commencement took on a decidedly socially responsible tone in the keynote address of William C. Baker, the president of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, as well as in the selection of other honored guests — the recipients of Alumni Citations and honorary degrees. And that tone was echoed in the remarks of President Trout, who pointed to a new spirit of volunteerism flourishing on campus.

In his address Baker said: "Every one of us falls into one of three classifications: 1) those who watch what happens; 2) those who wonder what will happen; and 3) those who make things happen. A leader is someone who makes things happen. I want, I expect, all of you to be leaders. Our planet is too small, too fragile, and too populated to survive much longer without more people who dedicate their lives to making things — good things — happen."

Baker told the graduates not to confuse leadership with power. True leaders, he said, do not seek power but have a confidence in their abilities and self-worth that encourages others to confer authority upon them. "Leaders set examples by their own actions, and people follow."

"These days," he continued, "ambition is back in vogue as compared to when I graduated from college [in 1976]. And ambition is a desirable quality if it is directed properly. Direct that personal ambition outward, toward the good of society, rather than inward for personal gain. Do this and you will achieve high reward."

He also encouraged the audience to conserve energy, to make due with less, and "to leave your campsite cleaner than you found it." With the highest standard of living in the world, he said, Americans represent 5 percent of the world's population yet consume 25 percent of the world's total energy usage. Nevertheless, we are quick to blame others for the world's environmental crises. "One of the most galling examples of this is to lay the blame for global warming on third world countries cutting their rain forests," Baker said. "Sounds reasonable, on the face of it, but consider the fact that most of these countries are just barely keeping their heads above water in a world economy driven by America's standard of living."

"Clearly, this is not to suggest that we should keep cutting rain forests, but any solution that seeks to save the world on the backs of those who have the least is not only morally indefensible but doomed to failure. True leaders do not point to blame in others. True leaders point to solutions."

Baker offered the Class of 1991 three challenges: end poverty and human

College Recognizes Two For Good Works

The bestowing of honorary degrees is one method by which a college shows its appreciation for services rendered, either to the school or to society at large.

This year, Washington College chose to look beyond its confines for two whose selfless good works could inspire others.

Honorary degrees were presented to Clara Adams-Ender, a black woman who carved her own way through the ranks of the U.S. Army to become Brigadier General, and Canon Richard Tabler Feller, a civil engineer with a love of art who devoted his life to the construction of a "modern" Gothic cathedral.

It was a second appearance at the College for both. General Adams-Ender spoke before a large audience last year on "Diversifying Leadership for the 21st Century." And Canon Feller, former national Knight Commander of the Kappa Alpha Order, was a guest speaker 20 years ago, when he gave an illustrated talk for the William James Forum on the building of a Gothic cathedral in the 20th century.

Adams-Ender made her way to the top by seizing the only opportunities presented to a poor black girl from rural North Carolina, and then by creating new opportunities for herself within the system. After earning a nursing degree and joining the Army, she took additional training in military service school to become in 1976 the first nurse, black and female, to earn the Master of Military Art and Science Degree and in 1982 the first black Army Nurse Corps Officer to graduate from the U.S. Army War College. In 1987 she was appointed Chief of the United States Army Nurse Corps and made a Brigadier General in the U.S. Army.

Adams-Ender lectures across the country on professionalism and leadership, racial and cultural diversity, substance abuse and prevention, and medical ethics. In recognition of the example her worthy life sets for others and her selfless contributions to causes ranging from the NAACP to the Friends of the Kennedy Center, she was presented with the Doctor of Public Service.

Clerk of the Works at the National Cathedral in Washington, D.C., since 1957, Canon Feller coordinated and supervised the cathedral construction to its conclusion last fall. The sixth-largest cathedral in the world has been lauded as a masterpiece of hand-crafted stone and wood and stained glass. Throughout his years of choosing materials and craftsmen, and while blending the best of the past with the best the modern age has to offer, he has chronicled the evolution of the structure that stands as a national, ecumenical house of worship and inspiration. His book, For Thy Greater Glory, is a tribute to the many hands that built it and an interpretation of the singular power of a 14th-century Gothic edifice.

For his role in the completion of the Gothic edifice that "embodies computer technology and a piece of the moon," and his documentation of this inspired task, Canon Feller was awarded the honorary Doctor of Letters.

suffering, save the environment, and stop the population explosion.

"Does such talk overwhelm you? Do you feel incapable of knowing where, how to begin? Don't worry — those feelings are to be expected on this day. It might help to remember the expression which grew out of Earth Day — think globally, act locally. This applies to all that we do. As you strike out to make things happen, your horizons may only be as far as the next block. There's nothing wrong with that. It just might be that working at the local level is the greatest challenge a leader can face and the best place a leader can be found."

President Trout awarded Baker the honorary Doctor of Public Service for his role in saving the bay. "Under the leadership of William Clayton Baker, the Foundation wields a trident of advocacy that could restore the Chesapeake Bay to pristine health: environmental defense, land conservation, and environmental education." By sponsoring and encouraging local action, Trout said, Baker and CBF have established a model plan of action that others might use to protect their threatened ecosystems.

Alumni Citations were presented to two alumni dedicated to making the world a better place.

R. Ford Schumann '73, founding director of Infinity Recycling, Inc., and M. Douglass Gates '53, director of Queen Anne's County's Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Prevention Services, were both awarded Alumni Citations for Public Service.

What began as one man's effort to find alternatives to brimming landfills and the environmental hazards of mass incineration has grown into a not-for-profit company dedicated to making recycling work for hundreds of Eastern Shore residents and businesses. Schumann, who began his recycling crusade by following garbage trucks in his battered VW van to collect recyclable papers, cans, and bottles his neighbors had set aside, says he dreams of the day when he will have a big recycling truck and the trash collectors will make do with a van.

By the end of this year, Infinity will have recycled more than three million pounds of paper, glass, aluminum and steel.

Christine Pabon, lecturer in modern languages since 1964, and Nathan Smith, professor of history and a member of the faculty since 1956, shared the Sears-Roebuck's 1990-91 Teaching Excellence and Campus Leadership award. WC was selected last spring to participate in the Sears-Roebuck Foundation's teacher recognition program, which makes awards to more than 700 of the nation's private liberal arts colleges and universities.

The second alumni citation went to Washington College's former alumni director who in the early 1980s began a new career as an alcoholism counselor and accepted the directorship of Queen Anne's County's Alcohol Services program in 1982.

The man responsible for lifting prohibition at Washington College in 1967 had a change of heart when he saw how damaging alcohol could be to some. He has since devoted his life to helping these people learn they can enjoy more productive lives if they are substance-free.

Under Douglass Gates' leadership, the Alcohol Services program has evolved into a comprehensive substance abuse and prevention program that helps addicts and promotes an anti-drug message to school children.

High Achievers Recognized At Commencement

In his remarks to the graduating Class of 1991, senior class president Steven C. Bruchey urged his classmates to reflect on their Washington College experience and thank those "who touched our lives in significant ways."

As a gesture of thanks, Kevin "Sparky" Kelly, president of the Student Government Association, then presented Dean Elizabeth R. Baer and Dr. Sherry Magill, with departing gifts. "This year Washington College will celebrate the 100th anniversary of co-education," said Kelly. "I believe the two women standing on the platform today epitomize the best of that tradition."

Bruchey, who was graduated cum laude with a degree in political science, was later awarded the Catlin Medal, given annually to the senior man voted by the faculty to be "outstanding in the qualities of scholarship, character, leadership, and campus citizenship." He is pursuing his master's degree in politics this fall at Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics on a full tuition scholarship.

Tamara-Diana Braunstein took Washington College's top honor — the George Washington Medal and Award — as well as the Political Science Award and the Modern Language Department Prize for her study of French.

The Washington Medal goes to the senior who shows the "greatest promise of understanding and realizing both in life and work the ideals of a liberal arts education." Braunstein, who was graduated summa cum laude, fifth in her class, won departmental honors in both political science and English.

The College's most lucrative award, worth $24,950 this year, was presented to Robert J. Thompson. The Sophie Kerr Prize, awarded for ability and promise for future fulfillment in the field of literary endeavor, is America's largest undergraduate prize. Thompson, an English major, won the prize for his collection of short stories and magazine features (see pages 22-25).

Donna Lynn White and Renée Nicole King, both of whom are biology majors, shared the Jane Huston Goodfellow Memorial Prize, given to graduating science seniors who have an abiding appreciation of the arts and humanities and have shown scholastic excellence. King, who was graduated cum laude with departmental honors in biology, also won the Alpha Chi Omega Music Award. White, who was graduated magna cum laude with departmental honors in biology and a minor in English, was presented with the Eugene B. Casey Medal, given to a senior woman voted by the faculty to be outstanding in the qualities of scholarship, character, leadership and campus citizenship, and the Senior Athletic Award.

The Clark-Porter Medal was awarded to Maria Elizabeth Karukas. The Medal is given annually by Charles B. Clark '34, in memory of Harry P. Porter '05, to the student considered by the faculty to have most clearly enhanced the quality of campus life. She was graduated magna cum laude with departmental honors in international studies and a minor in Spanish.

The Gold Pentagon Awards for meritorious service to the College were presented by Omicron Delta Kappa to senior John F. Herring and Dr. Sherry Magill.

The Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching went to Kevin M. Brien, professor of philosophy. The award, given annually to recognize high quality in teaching and adherence to rigorous standards, was initiated in 1964 by the Christian R. and Mary F. Lindback Foundation of Philadelphia.

Science Student Wins Fulbright

Donna Lynn White, an outstanding student-athlete who was graduated magna cum laude with departmental honors in biology and a minor in English, is one of 13 American students who have been awarded Fulbright Fellowships to study in the United Kingdom this year.

White left her Baltimore home in August to study microbiology in Manchester, England. She has deferred her admittance for graduate study at the Johns Hopkins University to spend a year working with Dr. Richard Atwell at Manchester Polytechnic Institute. After her fellowship, she intends to pursue her doctoral degree in molecular and cellular biology.

During an internship at University of Maryland's Center for Marine Biotechnology last summer, White examined the effect of nutrient deprivation on marine bacteria. Her successful Fulbright application proposed to investigate how similar deprivation would affect actinomycetes, a particular form of bacteria.

White is one of six Washington College students who in the past decade have received a Fulbright Fellowship for study in Europe. Her Fellowship is the first ever awarded to a science student from Washington College.

The Washington Elm, 1928-1991

After 63 years, the living symbol of Washington College is dead.

The Washington Elm fell victim to Dutch elm disease this summer, and after life-saving efforts failed, the tree was removed from the center of the campus lawn in early August.

Ironically, the Maryland Department of Natural Resources recently had certified the Elm to be the "champion" red elm in the state. With a height of 129 feet and a 20-foot girth, the Elm was Maryland's largest specimen. Reed Raudenbush, supervisor of buildings and grounds at the College, says that despite its demise the Elm will remain on the DNR's list of "champion" trees until its dimensions are eclipsed by another red elm.

Efforts were made in July to salvage the once-stately giant which crowned the College's front lawn. By trimming its dead growth, officials hoped that the Elm could hold on another year or two, or at least until students returned for classes in late August. The tree, however, did not respond and the disease spread quickly to the crown of the tree.

Finally, consideration for the safety of students and other passersby, and concern about the possibility of spreading of the disease, led the college administration to decide to remove the skeleton of the Elm before students returned.

Tree surgeons who arrived to begin dismantling the Elm branch by branch found a poem pinned to the tree. It began: "Dear Old Tree, Try. Please fight for your life." But the Elm had given up the fight weeks before.

As Pat Trams, Director of Alumni Affairs, reported to the Alumni

Council on July 23rd: "For a short time we had a very lean but green Elm. And then it just seemed to give up the ghost. The Elm turned brown and withered before our eyes. I suspect that if our Elm were really human, and not just anthropomorphized by 6,500 alumni, the lines on the EKG would ported. General Washington headed the list of subscribers to the endowment for the new college and gave his permission to use his name. He served on the Board of Visitors and Governors until his election as first President of the United States, and accepted the honorary degree of doctor of laws in 1789.

The tree also conveyed a sense of belonging, a sense of place. Students sprawled under its branches for the first outdoor classes of spring, seniors gathered around the Elm on the evening before their graduation for a champagne toast, and parents yearly sought cool relief from the heat on graduation day. Many Washington College students received their first kiss under the Elm, or wrote their first lines of poetry in its shade. It also was a point around which students could rally in times of sorrow: the Elm had presided over memorials for the dead and gatherings to remember soldiers of war.

"The death of this glorious and wonderful tree is terribly sad," President Charles H. Trout said. "At the same time, the life of the College goes on, and I am confident that in time we will find another symbol to represent the great spirit of Washington College."

have gone flat sometime last week."

The Washington Elm was a descendant of the elm tree in Cambridge, Massachusetts, under which General George Washington took command of the American Army on July 3, 1775. The tree, a gift to the College from the Old Kent Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, was planted as a seedling on April 26, 1928. In October 1930 the student body voted to change the name of the campus newspaper from The Collegian to The Washington Elm.

For generations of students, the Elm had been a campus landmark. It symbolized the historic beginnings of Maryland's oldest chartered college that General George Washington sup-

Salisbury Woman Endows Fund For Eastern Shore Scholarships

A new scholarship for deserving Eastern Shore students has been established at Washington College. Edna Jones Scheck, of Salisbury, Maryland, has endowed the Elwood M. Jones Scholarship Fund with a gift of $250,000 in memory of her late husband, an Eastern Shore businessman.

The Elwood M. Jones Scholarship is available to Eastern Shore residents who have demonstrated academic promise and who have need of financial assistance.

"We are grateful to Mrs. Scheck for her extraordinary contribution, and we are honored that she has selected Washington College as the recipient of this memorial fund," said College President Charles H. Trout. "This scholarship will help us continue our time-honored tradition of providing an outstanding education to the area's young people."

For 26 years Elwood M. Jones was president of Rubberset Company, a manufacturer of paint applicators. The company, located in Crisfield, Maryland, since 1966, is a division of the Sherwin-Williams Company.

Jones joined Rubberset Company as a sales representative for the Pacific Coast division in 1937 and transferred to the Newark, New Jersey, office in 1943 as an assistant sales manager. He was promoted to vice president and general sales manager in 1946, was named executive vice president in 1947, and became president in December 1948. Under his leadership the company grew from 50 to 450 employees by the time he retired in 1974. At that time the company was the single largest employer in Somerset County.

Mrs. Jones was a member of the Board of Visitors of Salisbury State College from 1969 until 1975, and a director and member of the Executive Committee of Peninsula Bank in Salisbury from January 1971 until his death in October 1981.

Raised in Culver City, California, Jones attended college on a scholarship during the Great Depression, graduating in 1935 with a degree in business administration from the University of Southern California. His widow says she is establishing the scholarship fund at Washington College to give needy students the same opportunity her husband had, and to give something back to the people of the Eastern Shore.

Her husband was "a dear, dear friend" and a hunting and fishing companion of Alexander G. "Sandy" Jones, Jr., a retired lawyer from Princess Anne and a Washington College alumnus who for 25 years has served on the College's Board of Visitors and Governors. Through him, she said, they came to know many Washington College alumni and learn more about the school. "If the alumni we met were representative of the caliber of people who come out of Washington College, we surely wanted to help that tradition continue," Mrs. Scheck said.

College Self-Reports Possible Violations To NCAA

Washington College this summer reported to the National Collegiate Athletic Association the results of an internal investigation that indicate possible violations of NCAA regulations. The suspected violations occurred in the College's tennis program, on both the men's and women's teams.

The possible violations involve NCAA by-laws regarding provision of housing and meals and the use of telephones and automobiles. The NCAA had not yet responded to the report at presstime.

College President Charles H. Trout said in a memorandum to the College's Board of Visitors and Governors, "I have been advised by counsel, who has reviewed the files of the tennis program, that the College is required to self-report the existence of possible NCAA violations in the tennis program. My personal review of the files does not indicate that there was intentional wrong-doing on the part of any former or current student."

The tennis program, which in the past few seasons has achieved national prominence, has seen a number of changes in recent months. In June, the College did not renew the contracts of the men's and women's tennis coaches, Fred Wyman and Holly Bramble. The decision was based on recommendations resulting from an athletic department self-study and an external review by a team of consultants which called for all head coaching positions to be filled by full-time employees in order to ensure greater institutional control over intercollegiate programs. The College had recently moved accordingly to full-time head coaches in crew, soccer, and swimming.

The decision to change the coaching staff raised questions from some about the College's continued commitment to the tennis program.

Athletic Director Geoff Miller emphasized that the College plans to maintain a competitive tennis program. "We definitely want to provide opportunities for our student-athletes to be challenged by the schedule they play," he said.

Miller has appointed Tom Finnegan and Todd Helbling to take over coaching responsibilities for men's and women's tennis. Finnegan will serve as head coach for both the men's and women's teams and Helbling will serve as assistant coach for both teams, beginning this fall.

Tom Finnegan, a 21-season basketball coach veteran who has built one of the finest Division III programs in the country, is no stranger to tennis. He served as head coach for the men's tennis team from 1975-85 and for the first women's team in 1975-76. For the past 19 years Finnegan has spent his summers as a teaching tennis pro at private clubs in Baltimore, Maryland, and in Madison, New Jersey.

Finnegan graduated in 1965 from Washington College where he was an All-American basketball player and a stand-out in soccer and baseball as well.

Todd Helbling will take over assistant coaching responsibilities for both tennis teams in addition to his recent appointment as head soccer coach. Helbling joined the athletic department of Washington College in the fall of 1990 as Cain Athletic Center coordinator. He played four years of varsity tennis at Millsaps College, serving as team captain his senior year. He was ranked as high as 30th in the nation by the Intercollegiate Tennis Coaches Association and third in the Southern Region in both his junior and senior years. Helbling has worked as an assistant teaching pro at the Vicksburg Country Club in Mississippi.

Academic Building Is Dedicated to Memory of Eugene B. Casey

Hundreds of friends of the College gathered in late April to dedicate the new academic center to the memory of philanthropist Eugene B. Casey and witness the unveiling of a bronze bust of his likeness presiding outside the forum on the second floor.

The grandeur of the structure, with its high ceilings, marble, and brass, is a tribute to a most unusual man who enjoyed many professions and whose life-long commitment to excellence will inspire generations of students who walk through its doors. Casey's widow, Betty Brown Casey '47, played an important role in seeing that the building was completed as her husband would have wished.

"Eugene Casey did more than contribute money and materials," Board chairman Louis L. Goldstein commented. "He offered inspiration, vision, positive attitude, and enthusiasm. By pledging a donation for this new campus facility before his death in 1986, Eugene Casey, along with Al Decker, Jim Price, and a few others, initiated a campaign that successfully raised $43.7 million during the past five years. Their contributions are a mark of excellence and an outstanding example of service above self."

Eugene Bernard Casey strove for excellence in all his endeavors. Over the span of 82 years he was an engineer, a lawyer, a master plumber, a financier, a farmer, a developer, a philanthropist, a loving husband and a devoted father to his six children and 11 grandchildren. He cared about many things: his family, his community, his country, history, architecture, and education.

Born June 13, 1904 to Rose O'Neill and Michael B. Casey of Washington, D.C., Casey began to set goals early in life. By the age of 10 he had his first job delivering bread before and after school. While attending the old Central High School he wrote stories about high school and college sports for both the Washington Post and the Washington Star. He studied mechanical engineering at Pennsylvania State University and law at Georgetown University. While still at Georgetown, he started the Casey Engineering Company, which played an important role in the building of several major structures in the Washington area.

Active in local and national Democratic politics, he was a supporter of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his New Deal. He served as an official of the Farm Credit Administration in 1940 and 1941 and as a farm policy adviser to President Roosevelt in the White House before entering the Navy during World War II.

Even before the war, Casey had expanded his interests from engineering into real estate and farming. During the 1950s and 1960s Casey pioneered low-cost housing in the Rockville-Gaithersburg area and was one of the first to build large apartment projects in Montgomery County.

Casey, who was one of the largest landholders in upper Montgomery County during the years after World War II, was also one of the most generous philanthropists. A history enthusiast, he financed the restoration of Red Hill, the last home of Virginia patriot Patrick Henry, in Brookneal, Virginia. He donated the Darnall Farm in Dawsonville, built in 1755, as well as several other parcels of land, to Montgomery County. He gave 204 acres in Urbana to the Maryland Sheriffs Boys' Ranch, which provides a home for troubled boys.

Mr. Casey is doubtless well remembered for his philanthropic deeds in his home community, Montgomery County, MD, but he has left an indelible mark on Washington College as well. His generous contributions have changed the course and reshaped the physical configuration of the school.

Before cutting the ribbon, Betty Brown Casey '47 suggested that students remember her late husband by emulating his spirit of generosity.

"Please consider giving one day a year, eight hours, back to your campus in some way, whether it's work in the library or cleaning up the lawn — whatever it is your college needs. Do it for yourself and do it for my late husband, and call it Casey Time."

CBF Interns Do Their Part To Save The Bay

Senior Tom Leigh, who grew up on the Eastern Shore's Wye River, had a vague notion he might be interested in marine biology as a career. His Pennsylvania suburbanite classmate, Karen Brady, did not know much about the Chesapeake Bay or its tributaries until she attended a few lectures sponsored by the Chesapeake Bay Foundation in her sophomore year.

Today, both biology majors are well-versed in soft-shell clamming regulations, variations in water quality on the Chester River side of Eastern Neck Island, and the varieties of sea grasses found growing on the flats of the island. Both are confident that the work they are doing can lead to a better understanding of how the Bay is faring under duress. And both have a better idea of the role they might play in helping save the Bay.

As the first participants in the joint Chesapeake Bay Foundation/Washington College Environmental Internship Program supported by a grant from the Jessie Ball duPont Religious, Charitable, and Educational Fund, Leigh and Brady are examining the effects of soft-shell clamming on the shallow water environment, submerged aquatic vegetation (SAV) and the benthic community (the river bottom) on the eastern side of the Eastern Neck Island Wildlife Refuge. The internship is sponsored by the Joseph H. McLain Program in Natural Sciences and directed by biology professor Donald A. Munson.

Beginning their internships last February, the students took photographs and made field observations to choose five sites for study. They observed the clamming sites and mapped the area with state restrictions they learned about in the CBF office in Annapolis. They also studied CBF's aerial photographs that for the past decade have chronicled beds of sea grasses and clamming activity in the area.

"We have met so many people and come into contact with several different organizations," says Leigh. "The people with Fisheries and Wildlife [Administration] have been very helpful, loaning us equipment and a jeep to get around in the Eastern Neck Island Refuge, and we hope to use the Environmental Protection Agency's computer system to work on the technical aspects of our study. The internship experience has really opened my eyes as to the number of study and work opportunities."

Brady has been drawn particularly to the Chesapeake Bay Foundation's environmental education programs. CBF takes groups of schoolchildren aboard its skipjack and introduces them to the Bay. "If children are introduced to environmental programs early, they'll have a better idea of what conservation and preservation are all about," she says.

This summer Leigh and Brady completed much of their field work. They also observed clamming activity, looked for diversity of life forms in the river bottom samples, and identified beds of submerged aquatic vegetation.

This fall, the two young scientists will complete their field data and lab work (the big bloom of grasses occurs in late August) and submit their findings to CBF. What they are documenting will be incorporated into a ten-year study of the Bay's submerged aquatic vegetation being conducted by the Fisheries and Wildlife Administration and the Chesapeake Bay Foundation. "We are a part of that, and it feels good to be helping," says Brady.

Where Emus And Wildebeests Roam

by Andrea Kehoe '89

As a boy growing up near the Choptank River in Cambridge, Maryland, Dr. James M. Potter '59 played with fish, turtles, frogs, and snakes the way other youngsters took to model airplanes or baseball. Even now the 54-year-old pathologist does not join his colleagues on the golf course.

As part owner of an exotic animal zoo in Pensacola, Florida, he spends his free time with gorillas and rodents, ostriches and jaguars.

A chemistry major at Washington College, he earned his medical degree at the University of Florida in 1963. Even as he began his career in pathology, he continued his interest in animals with bird watching and occasional study trips to Africa. In the late 1960s he helped build a small non-profit zoo in Pensacola, which eventually closed due to lack of funding.

Sitting by a riverbank in Kenya one night in 1982 with a zoologist friend, Potter decided to make another try at opening a zoo. They found four other investors, took out a loan, and began building in 1984. After a name selection contest was held, the facility was dubbed "The Zoo."

Animals were brought in from all over the world. Several hundred species of birds — parrots, tall cranes, emus, swans, ducks, geese — make up the largest animal population at the facility. The Zoo also houses wildebeests, bongos, and zebras, and an array of gibbons, chimpanzees, pygmy marmosets, and mandrill baboons.

"We get regular compliments," says Potter. "People compare us favorably to other zoos, but we still have a lot of growing and developing we want to do. There's more we'd like to do than we'll probably be able to get to."

The Zoo welcomes about 140,000 visitors annually. The 50-acre park includes a children's petting zoo and a 30-acre wilderness area that a small train loops through to show animals in the wild. Designed to be wheelchair accessible, the Zoo strives to reach out to all segments of the population and recently won an award for its work with disadvantaged children.

"Zoos probably get higher attendance than any other recreational ac-area already offered native species. Although some animal rights activists criticize zoos for removing animals from the wild, Potter points out that they play a vital role in maintaining a gene pool for endangered species, holding out the hope that the animals might someday return to their natural habitats. Further, he argues, zoos raise public consciousness about endangered wildlife.

"I don't have any illusions that people leave the park with an evangelical zeal to save the animal world," he says. "But if we can continue to make people more aware of the variety of animals that exist, they stand a chance."

When people compete with animals for food, as in many of the emerging Third World countries so frequently native to endangered species, the Western ideal of animal preservation seems like a luxury, he explains. Unstable political climates also place animals in jeopardy; gorillas, for example, may be among the casualties of the revolution that began in Rwanda two years ago.

"It would be nice if future generations could go to Africa and see gorillas in the wild," Potter says. "But we won't know how many are left until the fighting settles down."

The Zoo houses some endangered species, such as red wolves and Arabian and Scimitar-horned oryxes, which participate in breeding programs.

Potter, who lives in Pensacola with his wife Nell, usually goes to the Zoo one day a week to pull weeds or to help prepare for a new exhibit. Sometimes he just looks over the animals, though he has no particular favorites.

"I find them all fascinating," he says. "Saying which one you like the best is like saying which child you love the best. You love each for what it is."

tivity, including professional football," says Potter. "They make for a good outdoor family activity."

The privately held corporation lost money in its early years, and even now the profits that come in are channeled into expansion plans. The real motivation behind the Zoo is not to make money, but to inform the public of the aesthetic value of animals, as well as their ecological role.

"We make an effort to educate people, to show that an animal has value just because you see it," he says. "If visitors come away just feeling better by having seen a variety of species they wouldn't ordinarily see, that's good."

Lunch With Maria Luisa

by Professor Daniel L. Premo

It didn't take long for my daughter Alison to find Maria Luisa's name among the tags attached to the makeshift bulletin board. They were arranged in alphabetical order by family name and color-coded by sex. At almost six feet, Alison could scan the names at eye-level, while the Guatemalan secretary responsible for maintaining the children's roster for the Cuxlikel Project had to resort to a chair to reach the upper rows.

The family name "Ramirez" was where Alison expected to find it. "What surprised me," she said later, "were the other cards that had 'FALLECIDO' typed in capital letters below the name." With three years of Spanish behind her, she knew that "FALLECIDO" meant "deceased," but, at sixteen, she was not prepared to accept the mortality of children half her age.

Alison seemed consoled by my own expression of concern, although, in truth, the number of deaths recorded in the village of Chuculjuyup did not surprise me. Unlike Alison, for whom it was her first trip abroad, I had worked for the U.S. Government in Guatemala for five years. Moreover, I had read and written about infant mortality, malnutrition, and other indicators of suffering among the country's large Indian population for much longer. I could have explained to her that all the relevant measures — income, health, educational standards, and access to public services — suggest that only a very small percentage of Guatemala's rural population does not suffer from the ravages of poverty. However, the mosaic created by the number of "FALLECIDOs" was a far more persuasive indicator than any explanation or statistics I could give her that death is a constant companion of the young in Chuculjuyup.

No prolonged visits nor lengthy explanations were necessary for Alison to realize that Guatemala's medical and public health services are woefully inadequate, especially in the rural areas where most of the children like Maria Luisa live. Even where facilities have been established, the benefits of modern treatment and prevention often are thwarted by the women's traditional reliance upon curanderas (midwives) and herbal medicine. The intern who tends the modest health clinic at the Cuxlikel Project two mornings a week told us that the vast majority of children's deaths were from "easily preventable diseases." What he didn't say was that the cures for intestinal infections, pneumonia, and malnutrition depend ultimately upon a fundamental change in the state's social and economic priorities. And no reformer has occupied Guatemala's presidential palace since Jacobo Arbenz was overthrown in 1954.

*I*t was apparent that the Ramirez family enjoyed a certain status within the neighborhood. Their three-room adobe house had cement floors and a tile roof instead of straw. An equally sturdy animal shelter, and above all, the cow and chickens it housed, suggested a less precarious existence than that shared by most of the villagers.

Arbenz was in the fourth grade when we made our first contact with the Christian Children's Fund and the Ramirez family. It had been in Alison's name that we undertook the monthly sponsorship of a child in Guatemala. Before Maria Luisa, it had been her older brother, Carlos, who corresponded with Alison and dutifully acknowledged our contribution that provided the family with a monthly supplemental food basket and support for the project's health clinic, store, and pre-school.

At the time I rationalized that it would be "educational" for Alison to contribute part of her allowance to someone less fortunate and perhaps learn something about the value of sharing and the existence of other cultures. It might also have been a rationalization to soothe my own conscience. After all, what had I really done to combat the abuses and social injustice the Indians suffered under a succession of brutal military regimes after I left Guatemala in the early 1960s? As an academician, writing about such problems in scholarly journals is relatively cost-free, unless, of course, you happen to be Guatemalan. For that matter, signing a monthly check can also be relatively painless, hardly in keeping with the self-sacrifice expected from an orthodox Methodist childhood. On the other hand, it is the typical North American approach to problem-solving. And, as we learned during my 1991 spring sabbatical, the Christian Children's Fund's contact with almost 30,000 children in Guatemala has produced some beneficial outcomes.

During the months prior to our departure, I had hoped that the trip to Guatemala would represent for Alison more than the possibility of a visit with Maria Luisa. I wanted her to experience something about the life I had led before what in our family circle is known as "B.C." — "Before Chester-town." For years my daughter had heard me talk about my work and friendships in Guatemala, and, in particular, my affection for a fellow worker, Gonzalo Dardon, and his wife Graciela.

I did not share with Alison my fear that Gonzalo would be skeptical when I first wrote to him about the work of the Christian Children's Fund and our desire to visit Maria Luisa's village. Nor did I know how to convey to her my feeling that, more than anyone, it had been Gonzalo who taught me about the subtleties of interventionism, and who continues to remind me, whenever necessary, of my political naivete and Yankee arrogance. Like so many of his generation who took to the streets in the 1944 October Revolution, Gonzalo still resents the CIA's role in orchestrating the downfall of Guatemala's first democratic government. Over the years he has become tions exist. Gonzalo volunteered to accompany us and to make arrangements through the Christian Children's Fund's national office in Guatemala City for the visit.

On our arrival, Gonzalo presented Alison with an itinerary appropriately titled "Trip to Totonicapan," prepared by him primarily, I suspect, for her amusement. We were to travel by car to Chuculjuyup crossing on the highway that goes from "Seven Roads" to Totonicapan on March 18. There, the project director for Cuxlikel would meet us "between ten and eleven in my best example to my students of a Latin American intellectual struggling with the problems of development in a Third World country that dared to challenge U.S. hegemony. And I hoped that he would provide a similar example to Alison.

Alison shared my delight when Gonzalo replied with unexpected enthusiasm to my initial inquiry about the feasibility of our visiting an Indian family in a remote part of the country. It turned out that Maria Luisa's village is in the district of Chuisuc, Totonicapan, literally on "the other side of the mountain" from where he was born. One of Guatemala's 24 "Departments," Totonicapan is located in the western highlands, where most of the country's indigenous population lives. It is 95 percent Indian, compared to 45-50 percent for the country as a whole. Quiche is the principal indigenous language spoken throughout the Department, although local varia-

the morning" to guide us to the village. Gonzalo informed us that the Indians from Totonicapan are very formal when they receive guests in their home, but they "might possibly offer us something to eat." He predicted, quite accurately, as it turned out, that Maria Luisa's mother would have already "picked out the chicken that we will have for lunch."

The day after our arrival in Guatemala City we left for Totonicapan. Unfortunately, it was not long enough for Alison to recover fully from the effects of the dreaded "turista" that she had brought with her from Yucatan. Alison gamely insisted that with an extra dose of Lomotil, she would "tough it out." She spoke little during the drive from our hotel to Gonzalo's house and politely declined the Dardons' offer of breakfast.

Gonzalo insisted on driving the rental car, with no objections on my part. Alison quickly fell asleep in the back seat and stirred only occasionally when our conversation or a sharp curve disturbed her. Once free from the capital's early morning traffic, Gonzalo began talking nostalgically about his childhood and the hardships that had fallen on so many of the Indian villages in the region, especially one million were uprooted from their traditional lands and relocated in army-controlled "model villages." The military's strategy was simple and devastatingly effective: to "dry up the sea" in which, according to Mao, guerrilla insurgencies survived.

The landmarks of Rios Montt's scorched earth policy were still visible as we drove through Solola Department. Gonzalo's comments confirmed most of what I had read about the situation in the highlands. Although the food supply in the model villages is in general more secure, in many cases Indians from nearby Santiago Atitlan who were killed by the army last December. Ironically, they were demonstrating against abuses by soldiers from the local military base. The combination of pressure from International Human Rights Groups and Indian petitions persuaded the government to order the removal of the base from the outskirts of town. Gonzalo remarked that it was the first time in his memory that a base had ever been removed by popular demand.

A few hours into the trip we stopped to stretch our legs at a roadside lookout where one can admire the three volcanoes that dominate Lake Atitlan. Unfortunately, haze obscured all but San Pedro's perfect cone.

Alison had revived and tried to converse with the Indian children who approached us from the bush for a hand-out. I told her that 30 years ago they were more subtle, and perhaps less desperate. Rather than ask you directly for money, they would offer to pose for pictures for a few centavos. At the time, our respite seemed innocent and serene. Neither Alison nor I saw any reason to dwell on Gonzalo's warning that we travel only by daylight because of recent assaults on the road to Totonicapan. Four months later, we were to look back on our brief stop with more solemn reflection. A news item in one of the Guatemalan papers reported that a German tourist had been robbed and fatally shot at that very site.

An hour later we stopped to view the valley surrounding the provincial capital of Totonicapan. We were in the land of Gonzalo's childhood and he eagerly pointed out and named for us the mountains that remained his landmarks for the area. The effects of deforestation and soil erosion were visible everywhere. We ate the bologna sandwiches that Gonzalo's wife had prepared. No doubt Graciela remembered my limited taste for native food, and perhaps assumed that Alison suffered from similar culinary myopia.

The project director for Cuxlikel, Federico Tzul, was waiting for us by the roadside when we arrived at Chujuljuyup crossing. A personable young man in his early thirties, Federico suggested that we follow him the rest of the way. His jeep kicked up dust clouds as we snaked our way up the mountainside past clusters of adobe houses. We followed at a pru-after the military's counterinsurgency offensive of the early 1980s. Few villages in the western highlands have been spared the crossfire of violence spawned by the guerrillas, who rely upon them for information and supplies, and the army, who have depleted their youth for conscripts and punish those remaining for collaboration. Under the "rifle and beans" policy of General Rios Montt, who seized power in 1982, an estimated 30,000 Indians were killed and over dians have not been allowed to return to their former lands. The model villages, and the "development poles" of which they formed part, have succeeded as a form of social control, but they are not economically viable. Gonzalo summed up the situation succinctly when he said, "The army's program is virtually all security and no development."

As we approached Lake Atitlan, arguably one of Guatemala's natural wonders, I told Alison about the 13 Indent distance, annoyed by the dust, but thankful that our visit coincided with the dry season. Mud slides would make the road impassable for most vehicles once the rains began. The Indians we passed ignored Federico's jeep and focused their attention on the strangers trailing behind. Those in the vicinity of Maria Luisa's village had probably been alerted that her "godmother" was arriving that day. Shortly after we parked, Alison asked Federico, "How often do sponsors visit Chuculjuyup?" He replied that sponsors' visits were not uncommon at project sites located near the capital, but became less frequent in the more remote Departments like Totonicapan because of the distance and poor roads. We had traveled for over three hours to meet up with him, and our ascent to Chuculjuyup took an additional 30 minutes.

Maria Luisa met us on the road as we walked from the project store toward her house. Alison told me afterwards that she had "recognized her instantly." I confessed that I would have walked past her, although her smile and exquisitely embroidered blouse should have alerted me. Indian women still wear the colorful dress of their native village, while most men have discarded their traditional whites for western style clothes. The transition has been in progress for some time. During my first visit to the marketplace in Chichicastenango in 1960, I observed an Indian mother bargain for a pair of blue jeans for her young son clad in white. When I returned to Chichicastenango in 1978, both the number of foreigners and the variety of western dress had proliferated to the point where the marketplace seemed geared more to accommodate the tourist trade than the Indians whom it had originally served.

After brief introductions in Spanish, which included a formal embrace from Maria Luisa for Alison and me, she escorted us along the path to her house. The girls studied each other en route, trying not to stare, but tongue-tied by the uncertainty and emotion of the moment. Mr. Ramirez and his wife, Maria, greeted us in the dirt courtyard and introduced several of their older children. The younger ones remained partially hidden, waiting for reassurance that it was safe to approach these pallid intruders. The family dog was more certain of its role and had to be forcefully restrained and silenced by our host. Alison dwarfed the entire family and self-consciously strained to minimize the height differential that had always seemed such an advantage. Among the first to overcome their shyness were the twins, Santos and Santa. The former's smile, whether induced by fear or delight, made him an instant favorite with Alison.

It was apparent that the Ramirez family enjoyed a certain status within the neighborhood. Their three-room adobe house had cement floors and a tile roof instead of straw. An equally sturdy animal shelter, and, above all, the cow and chickens it housed, suggested a less precarious existence than that shared by most of the villagers. The fresh milk no doubt accounted in part for the remarkable survival of all 11 of the Ramirez children. At 13, Maria Luisa is the statistical "median." Although electricity is available in the village, water must still be retrieved from public taps. The reliance on "rustic latrines" (the Christian Children's Fund's euphemism for a ditch behind the house) remains one of the principal hazards to public health.

A weaver by trade, Maria Luisa's father demonstrated his skill on a loom occupying one end of the room that serves as a workshop and dining area by day, and a sleeping area at night. Mrs. Ramirez and the older children, including Maria Luisa, supplement the family income by weaving, pottery making, and domestic work. The family also has access to a plot of land where it grows some of its own corn and beans.

Mr. Ramirez orchestrated our visit with earnest solicitude. He conversed with us while his wife and Maria Luisa attended to matters in the kitchen. At one point he called our attention to a collage of family pictures framed on the wall, including several of Alison dating back to elementary school. He spoke with special pride about his two oldest sons, both of whom are in the army, one of them a non-commissioned sergeant. I recognized the distinctive uniform of a "kaibil" — the special forces unit responsible for most of the counterinsurgency operations in the western highlands. I wondered how many villages they had helped to destroy and if the army's repression ever conflicted with family or tribal loyalties. Guatemala's recent history would suggest that a Quiche-speaking Maya from Totonicapan can be trained to overcome any compunction in killing Indians who speak one of the lesser dialects.

We were seated on assorted wooden chairs around a knee-high table that reminded me of kindergarten. Before long, Mrs. Ramirez brought in fresh milk and rolls. My instinct was to forego the milk, but there was no way to tactfully decline. Alison gave it no thought and had the cup to her lips while I was still fretting. Her first sip elicited a ¡Qué buena la leche! (great milk!) and settled the issue. Although my cup seemed bottomless, I drank it with feigned gusto and accolades for the cow (¡Qué vaca maracillosa!). At one point I suggested that Alison offer to help Maria Luisa in the kitchen. Ferocious barking greeted her departure from the room. Mr. Ramirez surprised me with his agility, leaping to the doorway and calming the family dog before it could attack. His timely intervention was not without cost, however; he broke his chair in the process.

Before the milk had time to settle, the women served us lunch: chicken, rice, corn tamales, and a piece of beefsteak. Meat in any form is not part of the Indians' regular diet. Even chicken is reserved for special occasions. We were treated to a meal the Ramirez family might otherwise have eaten for Easter or the birthday of the village's patron saint.

It became evident that Mr. Ramirez had not intended for Maria Luisa or her mother to sit with us for lunch. Alison seemed uncomfortable with the former's prolonged absence from the room, so I asked that they be allowed to join us. During the meal they responded to our questions, but, for the most part, they maintained the passivity expected of Indian women in the presence of men.

I noticed that Gonzalo had the same difficulty I did trying to cut the beef with the utensils provided in our behalf, so I followed his lead and attacked it mano a mano (hand-to-hand combat). On the way home he confided that the struggle had loosened a tooth. It both amused and surprised me when Alison said the meal was "the best she had eaten since leaving the States."

Alison, Maria Luisa, and I had a brief time together after lunch. The girls' efforts at communication appeared strained, not so much because of language, but from the natural awkwardness originating from distinct cultures. Moreover, Alison's sponsorship gave her an official status that their slight difference in ages could not overcome in a matter of hours. Smiles substituted for words, while Maria Luisa's infant nephew provided a focus for sharing and conversation. I wondered how much longer it would be before she had a child of her own.

We had decided in advance that any special gifts for either Maria Luisa or the family should be made through the CCF. We had no wish to insult the family by bringing them something that might suggest need. Gonzalo had taught me long ago that money is not universally accepted as an expression of gratitude or friendship. Indians maintain a sense of self-esteem and personal honor in the midst of their poverty — a characteristic that a materialistic society like ours finds difficult to comprehend. The Spanish call it "dignidad," for which the customary English translation of "dignity" is inadequate. Despite my presumed sensitivity to such matters, the coloring books and crayons we brought for the children seemed incongruous with the surroundings. So did the rag doll we had for Maria Luisa. Seeing her clutch it on her lap, I could not imagine her having either the time or the frivolity to play with dolls. For children like Maria Luisa there is no adolescence. Puberty burdens them immediately with the responsibilities of adulthood.

Unlike many villages in Guatemala, there is an elementary school in Chuculuyup. The teachers are hired by the government and commute daily from the provincial capital of Totonicapan. In addition, the CCF operates a pre-school in the village and plans to open a second one in the district. Maria Luisa's fourth grade class meets in the afternoons so, after lunch, we insisted that she not miss school on our account. Federico said we could visit her class on the way out of town.

Before leaving, Maria Luisa gave Alison a tapestry and two belts, including one we had admired on a small loom in the courtyard when we arrived. I asked Mr. Ramirez if we might take some pictures of the family. Indian women and children are often reluctant to allow themselves to be photographed. They believe the camera robs them of their spirit. The more superstitious among them will also avoid the "evil eye" cast by foreigners. However, no one in the Ramirez family objected. The only difficulty was getting everyone assembled in the courtyard. Mr. Ramirez miscounted the children twice, but eventually everyone except the dog made it for a family portrait.

We heard the school before we saw it, and it wasn't yet recess. I asked Federico to obtain the teacher's consent for us to visit her classroom. She greeted us at the doorway and bristled momentarily when the children strained noisily to inspect the foreigners. She apologized, adding that it was difficult to maintain order with 53 students. However, I noted their instant response when she rapped for silence. Gonzalo tactfully mentioned that we, too, were educators, and for many years we had worked with and admired the dedication of the country's rural teachers. I asked her to excuse us for Maria Luisa's tardiness and the disruption our arrival had already created. It was difficult to tell if Maria Luisa was pleased or embarrassed by the attention from her classmates. Perhaps a little of both.

At the teacher's invitation, I greeted the children from the people in our "village in Maryland," and added how pleased we were to visit them. They were more intrigued by Alison than by my remarks. She was momentarily flustered when I told the children that she also had greetings for them. Her "Hola" (Hi!) and "Mucho gusto de conocerles" (Pleased to meet you!) conveyed a sense of the day's accumulation of feelings. The youngsters closest to me seemed impressed that "any girl that tall" could speak at all.

The teacher gave Maria Luisa permission to accompany us to the car for a final, private goodbye. She and Alison walked together as they had earlier in the day, although this time their arms were around each other's waist.

During the ride back to Guatemala City, I asked Alison how much longer she thought it would be before Maria Luisa, like her brother before her, would be considered too old for us to continue our sponsorship. "Not to worry," she said: "I already have my eye on Santos and Santa."

Coeducation And The Changing Role of Women At WC

by Sue De Pasquale '87

This fall, Washington College begins a year-long celebration of the centenary of coeducation. With much fanfare, Washington College will pay tribute to women scholars — writers and lawyers, artists and historians, musicians and theologians, politicians and philosophers, scientists and businesswomen. Throughout the year, women who have made significant contributions in their fields will visit Washington College to share their knowledge and, perhaps, inspire our current student population, male and female, to greater heights. And, mirroring the 50th anniversary of coeducation celebrated in 1941-42, the College will award honorary degrees to noted women of our day.

Just as importantly, though, is the second objective of this anniversary celebration —that is, to stimulate discussion of the relationships between women and men, and to consider how those relationships might be improved. Just how far from equal treatment are we?

To help launch the coeducation celebration, Washington College Magazine asked Sue DePasquale, Washington College alumna and journalist, to explore how attitudes towards women in education, and women's roles as educators and students, have changed during the course of the past century at Washington College.

How was Professor Proctor to know, when he boarded the Chestertown steamer bound for Baltimore, that his trip this day in early September 1891 would set off such an unexpected chain of events? He had been teaching biology and chemistry at Washington College now for several years, and making the daily ride to Baltimore to visit relatives whenever time and the weather permitted. As the steamer pulled away from the dock, he sat down on his customary bench to bask in the sunlight, his mind contentedly drifting off. But today's journey was not to prove as smooth as he had hoped. Jarred from his reveries by the rustle of petticoats, he opened one eye to see a band of young women clustered about.

Did he teach at Washington College? they inquired. Why, yes, Proctor responded pleasantly. Their next question was not as easy: Why aren't women allowed to attend classes at the College? Proctor had no ready answer. He knew the College's charter did not deny them the opportunity. Yet up to now, Washington College, like many other colleges of the day, was the unchallenged realm of the "stronger" sex. (Gettysburg College had enrolled its first women only six years earlier. The College of William and Mary would not follow suit until 1918.)

Sensing the professor's hesitation, the young women jumped in with a friendly barrage of reasons as to why they should be able to enroll at Washington College. They were sincere, their arguments well-executed, and Proctor found himself unwittingly warming to their cause. He promised to take their case before College President Charles Reid once he got back to Chestertown.

Reid, too, was easily won over. On

*T*oday's coed would laugh in disbelief if told she could not run for SGA, that she had to be in by 10 p.m. and get written permission to leave campus for the weekend, even though her male classmates could do as they pleased. But it wasn't so long ago that such inequities were inextricably woven into the social fabric of the times.

The 1911 Pegasus sophomore class picture showed only two women in the "Academic" program. The majority of women students enrolled at that time were studying to be teachers in the "Normal" program.

September 18, 1891, he proposed to the Board of Visitors and Governors that "females be admitted to classes and lectures of Washington College as day students." The Board adopted the resolution (mostly for pecuniary reasons, historians speculate today), and the first 11 young women became members of the student body at Washington College.

In the 100 years that have passed since that day in 1891, the College has seen a succession of strong-willed women, both students and faculty members, push for continued progress for the "fairer" sex. Like their predecessors on the Chestertown steamer, these women have been guided by a steely determination to speak up, and to continue speaking up, until their voices are heard.

Today's coed would laugh in disbelief if told she could not run for SGA, that she had to be in by 10 p.m. and get written permission to leave campus for the weekend, even though her male classmates could do as they pleased. But it wasn't so long ago that such inequities were inextricably woven into the social fabric of the times.

Maggie Horsley, professor of sociology, had her work cut out for her, both in the classroom, and in Reid Hall dormitory, where she spent a stint from 1960 until 1965 as Dean of Women. "I tried to get the young women to consider that life is not just getting engaged and then getting married, raising a family and having your husband looking after you for the rest of your life. But it was difficult," she recalls today, from her home in Washington, D.C. "They thought I was crazy."

Horsley's students were not the first to have that reaction. Her adviser at Berkeley was shocked when he learned that she yearned to do graduate work in anthropology. His advice? Give up the idea and get married. Horsley ignored the first part of his suggestion and went on to earn her Ph.D. from Columbia University. She taught at Hofstra University before coming to Washington College in 1956; she would remain until her retirement 30 years later.

Horsley came on board around the same time as modern language professors Gerda Blumenthal and Esther Dillon, names well-known to a generation of Washington College students. The three women became fast friends and quickly established themselves as leaders within the predominantly male faculty. All three would go on to serve as department chairs.

"Anytime we spotted a bright woman, we would encourage her to go on to an M.A. or a Ph.D., or to anything else she felt inclined to do," Horsley says of the late 1950s. "The problem was, that was not considered a proper female role." Women were supposed to be "passive, sweet, and not too bright," she recalls. "If you wanted a date, you'd better keep quiet that you were getting A's."

During those years, few of her fe-senior class.

There were exceptions, of course — women who would not have dreamed of hiding their scholarly light under a barrel — like Christine Pabon '62. She is now director of Washington College's Study Skills Program.

"I knew there were other women who were holding back," she recalls, "but I was an aberration. I was vocal from the moment I walked into the College. I had my hand up all the time — you couldn't shut me up. You still can't," says Pabon, who graduated second in her class.

male students joined in class discussions. It often was not until the semester's first blue book exam that she would discover "that young woman in the corner who kept her mouth shut really did know what was going on." Even then, grades could be deceiving. "Sometimes very intelligent girls would get D's and F's, rather than A's. They weren't going to be bothered with studying — there was no point to it. It wouldn't get you a date. It wouldn't get you a man. So they would settle for a nice, ladylike C."

Academically, women too often had a low opinion of themselves, says the sociologist. They needed encouragement, and Horsley tried her best to give it to them. Together with English professors Bob Kirkwood and Nancy Tatum, for example, she helped establish an honor society for women in the Speaking up was not always easy, however. In her freshman year, Pabon tied for the class's top spot with friend and classmate Patrick Cullen '62. Since the two had identical GPA's, they both received the customary Fox Medal at Fall Convocation award ceremonies. After they had left the stage and returned to their seats, Cullen showed her the check that accompanied his medal. He was appalled to find she had not gotten one too.

"You might ask, 'Why didn't you go in and raise the roof?'" she says. "Well, part of it was the atmosphere of the times. Somehow, women weren't as conscious of those abuses. I knew that it hurt, but I didn't feel I could go and raise a ruckus."

Despite the incident, she pushed ahead in her study of Spanish and French, thanks in large part to the influence of professors Dillon and Blumenthal. "They were my two mentors, the women who formed me, the ones I admired. They had a lot to do

Miss Bertha M. Stiles, instructor of English, mathematics, and German, was the very first woman to grace the faculty of Washington College, in 1893. Not surprisingly, she became the College's first housemother, when Normal Hall opened in the spring of 1897. By establishing a Normal Department to train women as public school teachers, the College could justifiably ask the Maryland General Assembly to underwrite the cost of building the dormitory (known today as Reid Hall). The sum agreed upon was $6,000. Normal Hall "sat on a hill, ninety feet

(One went on to earn her Ph.D. from Johns Hopkins University, another to be head of a Maryland junior college.) The Normal curriculum's popularity ultimately proved to be its undoing. Fearing that the College's liberal arts curriculum was being overshadowed, the administration discontinued the department that same year. The program's demise, coupled with the increasing "disciplinary problem" of housing men and women on the same campus, prompted the closing of Normal Hall as well. The few women who continued to enroll at Washington College were day students.

The windows of Normal Hall remained darkened until 1919, when the Board of Visitors and Governors affirmed its commitment to assuring "equal provisions" for the education of both sexes. In those intervening years, women had worked alongside men in factories during World War I, and had earned the right to vote. When they returned that fall to renew their role as boarders, they came this time expecting to share fully in the liberal arts experience.

Becky Brown Owens '25 enrolled at Washington College during the same decade that Normal Hall was enlarged and renamed to honor Charles Reid, the faculty head who had pushed coeducation through.

"We kept our rooms very clean, because the Dean of Women had her suite there," recalls Owens. "We would sit in her living room and have nice, friendly chats about whatever might be bothering us. From four until six o'clock in the afternoon, the boys would come over and we would dance to records. In the evening, we'd sit out on the front porch and talk a while." A New Jersey teacher for 40 years, Owens currently lives in Florida, where she coordinates a program for the aged.

If the 87-year-old's memory serves correctly, the Class of '25 consisted of about 25 students, seven of whom were women — an "excellent percentage," she says. "We could be so choosy. It was delightful. We didn't have to sit around wondering if we'd get asked to the cotillion."

A political science major, Owens played intramural tennis and was president of the women's student council. Later, as the first female president of Washington College's Alumni Council, she was instrumental in es-with my intellectual development."

Blumenthal, who taught French and world literature, would be the first recipient of the College's Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching in 1964. Dillon, together with Horsley and history professor Nate Smith, was a "prime mover" for curricular change, Pabon says. "She was one of the principal architects of the Four Course Plan. Her leadership affected the faculty, the curriculum, and the student body in a profound way."

Horsley recalls sharing a special camaraderie with Dillon and the other female members of the faculty. "One of the great myths in American culture is that women are isolated and unsupportive of each other," she says. "Women who went into higher education at that time had been through the mill. They all stuck together."

above tidewater," from which there was "a beautiful view of the town, Chester River, and the surrounding country," according to a 1897-98 course catalog. The basement held a dining room, kitchen, and pantry. On the first floor were apartments for female faculty. The upper floors could accommodate up to 32 students.

With the dormitory's construction came a set of rules, draconian by today's standards, which forbade "social intercourse between gentlemen and lady students except in the presence of one or more teachers." Only on Friday evenings, between 8 and 10 p.m., could the young women host a reception for their male classmates.

During those early years of coeducation, most women opted to take the two-year Normal Course, which enabled them to earn a certificate to teach in Maryland's elementary schools. By the spring of 1911, Washington College had awarded normal certificates to 132 women. By contrast, only 14 women had earned bachelor's degrees.

tablishing the Alumni House. "When I was president, the Alumni Council had the best attendance ever," she says, laughing. "All the men came to watch me so I wouldn't put anything over on them."

The octogenarian's years as a student at Washington College were peppered with amusing escapades. There was the winter evening she and some classmates snuck out of the dorm to go sledding — and got caught. And the time a group of women (chaperoned by the Dean of Women, of course) accompanied the men's basketball team to Baltimore. On the steamboat ride back to Chestertown, the Dean's hat blew off, taking her wig with it. "We told her she looked much better without it," says Owens, chuckling.

When basketball games were held at Cain Gymnasium, everyone gathered afterward for a bonfire rally. "The boys would stand on boxes and make speeches around the bonfire. When it was time to go home, they would sing 'Goodnight, Ladies' and start putting the fire out. Do you know how they did that?" she asks, her voice lowering conspiratorially. "They would all pee on it! That's when we knew it was time for us to go."

No one questioned obvious differences in the way men and women were treated, Owens says. "In those days, you didn't think about male chauvinism. It never entered our minds," she says. "Men were presidents of all the clubs, but that didn't worry us. We were allowed to be in the clubs and plays. And we supported them in sports as cheerleaders."

The situation hadn't changed all that much by the mid-1930s, says Miriam Ford Hoffeecker '36. Men fielded the varsity sports teams that traveled to other colleges, while women remained at home to compete in intramural basketball, tennis, archery, and field hockey. "We recognized that money was scarce and there was no way in the world they could support any more varsity teams, so we enjoyed what we had," she says.

Hoffeecker couldn't help feeling gleeful, though, when her field hockey team challenged the football men to a hockey match — and won. Or when tennis great Jean Harshaw Lesko '37 became the first woman ever named to a men's varsity team. "That was one of our victories," says Hoffeecker. "She could beat all the men."

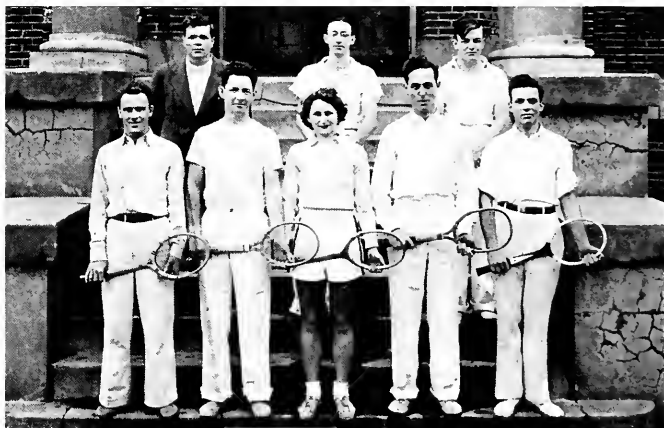

Her junior year, Hoffeecker and some friends decided the time had come to breach the all-male bastions of the Student Council. They selected Dorothy Clarke Clifford '36, blessed with a flair for the dramatic, to make their case before the council's faculty advisor, Dean Jones. As Hoffeecker tells it, the meeting didn't last long. To the suggestion that women be allowed to run for office, he replied, "Why, Miss Clarke, that is impossible."

"But why is it impossible?" she pressed.

"Because there has never been a cation, the 1942 celebration remains a model. "In addition to honoring women who have accomplished a great deal in America," says Kathy Mills, associate professor of music and chair of the centennial committee, "the committee hopes to stimulate discussion on the broader topic of gender relations." (See sidebar)

Gender relations today, of course, are a world apart from what they were 100, 50, even 20 years ago. "It was in the late 1960s," says Horsley, "that you started to see a real difference in attitudes. Women grew more talkative in woman on the student council," he said in dismissal.

Just a few years later in 1942, Eleanor Roosevelt, the nation's First Lady, came to Washington College to speak at Commencement on May 25th. Her address, carried nationwide by the Mutual Broadcasting System, was the crown jewel in the College's celebration of its first 50 years of coeducation. For the first time ever, three women were chosen to receive honorary degrees at a Washington College Commencement: Roosevelt, Mary Adele France, the 1900 graduate who was principal of St. Mary's Seminary and Junior College, and writer Sophie Kerr Underwood, a Denton native.

As the College gears up to commemorate an entire century of coeducation, and more interested in doing something with their lives beyond getting married."

America was gripped in the throes of social upheaval, and the times, they definitely were a changin'. Student handbooks of the era show just how quickly. Up until 1966-67, men were not allowed to cross Route 213 to the women's dormitories after 6:30 p.m. That changed a year later when "open house hours" went into effect. Members of the opposite sex (provided they were dressed in "good taste") could visit up until midnight on weekend nights. Doors, however, had to remain open and rooms kept "neat and orderly." The next year, doors could be closed as long as the lights remained on. In 1971 the floodgates of permissiveness opened wide, washing away enforced morality and leaving behind a 24-hour visitation policy.

Washington College students of the 1990s enjoy a freedom from social restrictions that would have made their predecessors blanch. Men and women think nothing of sharing dorms, even bathrooms. Housemothers have been replaced by resident assistants, students themselves, who must be prepared to deal with such issues as alcohol abuse, "safe sex," and date rape.

Women routinely serve as class presidents and Elm editors, and are standouts on playing fields and in science labs. No longer restricted to teaching, they prepare for careers in law, medicine, and engineering. There has even been an interest in establishing a women's studies program.

"Women are definitely less docile," says Nancy Tatum, an English professor at the College since 1960. "Over the years, there have been some pretty outspoken and able women who have really made themselves felt on campus." Tatum believes that there is still room for improvement, however, particularly within the faculty. Only one department chair is currently filled by a woman; just three have reached the rank of full professor. Many more fill the lower and middle ranks, but inducing them to stay has been a problem, she says.

"In those years [the mid-1980s], when we were being told how aggressively the College was pursuing equality, women seem to have lost ground rather than gained it," says Tatum. Recently launched faculty enhancement grants, designed to stimulate and support research, may help to brighten the picture a bit, she says.

To be sure, there are obstacles that remain to total equality between the sexes, both at Washington College and throughout the nation. "But the bias today is much more subtle," says Christine Pabon. "Sometimes I don't think we realize how far we've come."

Living Together: Men and Women in America—Past, Present and Future

A year-long celebration marking the centenary of coeducation at Washington College, 1891-1991

August 29: OPENING CONVOCATION:

Keynote address: "Toward Modernity: Washington College and The Cult of True Womanhood," by Charles H. Trout, President of the College. Honored guest: Helen Gibson, a founder of the Washington College Concert Series.

ART EXHIBIT: Recent works by Maryland artist Allyn Massey. First of a series of five exhibits featuring the work of regional women artists, including later exhibits by Carol Wood and Stephanie Sove-Ney.

September 11: ART LECTURE: "Regional Women Artists," by Dr. Leslie King Hammond, Director of Graduate Studies at the Maryland Institute, College of Art.

September 19: LECTURE: "Samuel Beckett and Women," by Linda Ben-Zvi, Professor of English at the University of Michigan.

October 18: CONCERT SERIES: The Peabody Trio, performing a piece by Shulamit Ran, winner of the 1991 Pulitzer Prize for Musical Composition.

October 19: ALUMNI PANEL DISCUSSION: "Common Ground," a panel discussion featuring alumnae from the past seven decades discussing the environment for women in higher education and its effect on their subsequent careers.

October 21: LECTURE: "Charlotte Brontë, Elizabeth Gaskell and Disappointment," by Christopher Ricks, Professor of English at Boston University.

October 23: LECTURE: "Women in Politics: The State and Local Level"

November 15: CHORUS CONCERT: Music of Women Composers performed by the Washington College Community Chorus.

November 18: LECTURE: "The Status of Women in National Political Life"

November 22: SYMPOSIUM: Women in Middle Eastern History and Culture

December 3: CONCERT SERIES: Christine Ciesinski, Soprano.

January 23: LECTURE: Theologian Rosemary Reuther discussing liberation theology and women's rights.

January 31: CONCERT: A concert of music by American women composers, including Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Barbara Kolb, Ruth Seegar, and Judith Lang Zaimont, by Kathleen Mills, piano, associate professor of music at Washington College.

February 22: CONVOCATION: Honored guests: Martine van Hamel, Artistic Director of the New Amsterdam Ballet; Marian Wright Edelman, President of the Children's Defense Fund, and Linda Koch Lorimer, President of Randolph-Macon Woman's College.

March 20 (tentatively scheduled date): PERFORMANCE: British actress Billie Whitlaw performs readings from Samuel Beckett

May 17: COMMENCEMENT: Honored guests include Barbara Mikulski and other noted American women.

For more information about these and other events to be scheduled throughout the year, contact the Campus Events Coordinator (800-422-1782 ext. 402).

Confusion exists among men, she says. "The poor things aren't sure whether to hold the door for us, or slam it in our faces."

Women, too, are being forced to redefine their roles. "Young women are being pulled in several directions," says Horsley. "They want marriage and children, but they're also bright and want to fulfill themselves with a career. Combining the two isn't easy.

"It's always more comfortable to live in a society where you are told what to do and what to think," says the sociologist. "In a society where you must define your own role, you may not be happy, but you're better off."

Excerpts From Sophie-Winning Fiction: "Teef"

by Robert J. Thompson '91

I'd grow old, my children would visit me, my grandchildren would love me, and Westinghouse would keep me at work until I'd retire. That's what I figured, but I was wrong.

My only wife died at home while I was in North Africa, and my only son died while he was in Vietnam, but Westinghouse had plenty of business and gave me work until I was 65. Then I had money to retire in 1983. Now I have a Winnebago and time to drive it, slowly and everywhere.

Soon after I retired, I started driving around, and on the East Coast I drove through a town less than two stories tall. It sat next to Birch Creek and was called Incline, Maryland. The first time I passed through, I saw a little girl about six years old pulling a blue plastic toboggan across this front yard. It was too flat for sledding there. I was too old for sledding, so I didn't dwell on the kid. I'm sure she had fun.

I made a point of returning to Incline every once in a while. I spent my nights in my Winnebago in the parking lot of a warehouse that looked like it must have been used for something back in the 1920s, and I spent my days drinking coffee in Noreen's, the only restaurant. Since I retired, seeing sights became like a job to me, and visiting Incline, a town with nothing to see, became a vacation of sorts.

The second time I visited Incline, in 1984, I met this gentleman on the shoulder of Route 174 outside of town. He stood next to his beige Dodge Dart with its bald flat rear left tire. When I pulled over and offered him a ride to the gas station he just looked at me and looked at my mobile home and said, "I don't need no ride to no gas station, I need a tar patch an' a air pump." He must've known that he didn't need to say "please" to me.

I watched him peel the tire off the rim with a crow bar and I muttered something about the tire being bald and maybe he needed a new one. He said, "Why don't ya go into that house a yours an' I'll tell ya when I'm done, okay?" So I did. I was dozing off in the driver's seat a half hour later when he rapped on the window, shouting, "Hey you. Yea you! Git up." I rolled down the window. "Lemme show you my house," he said. He knocked the side of my Winnebago with his fist and added, "Leave this damn thing here, will ya? Wassername?"

"Paul Evintrude," I said. He rolled his eyes.

"Oliver Putz," he replied. "Come on."

We went to his falling house near the river. He poured me a water from the kitchen sink and started asking me all about the places I'd been in that "thing you call home." I told him about Canada and Mexico and all the states in between. He told me he never went anywhere because he could take care of himself right where he was, thank you very much. Then he pointed to a workboat tied to his dock and told me how he built it in his shed out back during the same time that I was busy "traipsin' around the world."

"When I finished buildin' the boat about two years ago," he said, "I

This year's winner of the Sophie Kerr Prize, Robert J. Thompson spent the summer in Alaska reading and painting fishing boats (while the fishermen were on strike). He plans to return to Alaska next spring.

painted her. And in the end, right on the bow there, I needed a name an' I can't read, so I used them letters there on the 'frigerator — copied 'em real good." He showed me the logo on the refrigerator — G.E.

"So you named it G.E.?" I asked.

He rolled his bottom lip under his top lip like he just heard some bad news. "Is 'at what it said? Well I almost named it that, but right after I painted . . . wha'd you say, Gee Eee . . . on the bow, it rained real hard and the paint ran. The nex' day a guy come over askin' me stuff. Said he was from a paper. He assed what the name of the boat was an' I didn't know, so I just pointed to the letters on the bow. He squinted his eyes like this when he saw 'em an' he said, 'What?' I said, 'Yea, it's The What? So that's what I call her: The What? I didn't know what to say."

He told me other things. He was proud of his boat. He had others before it, but this was his beauty (and it was). He made a living tonging for oysters. When he wasn't tonging for oysters he was in his shed, making things. He showed me the shed.

It was actually a barn. It was twice as large as his house and full of openings — doors, windows, broken planks here and there in the sides — all of them for a purpose. He had it full of unfinished cabinets, smaller boats, furniture, anything that he could make with his hands. He said he decided which project to work on by the time of day. If there was a patch of sunlight shining through the hole in front of the unfinished cabinet, he would work on the cabinet. If in the afternoon the sun flooded through the window next to the rowboat, he's work on that, and slowly these things were made.

After I met Oliver, I made a point of returning to the town once in a while. The only time he'd come into Noreen's was when he'd see my Winnebago on the parking lot. I was the only person he ever talked to, when he did talk, and I think that made me proud. He'd usually sit across from me at a table next to the front window where the "SORRY, WE ARE CLOSED" sign faced us. Sometimes we didn't talk at all. Sometimes we'd pass the afternoons on trivial matters. Oliver could tell you what phase the moon would be in on any given date or he could tell you when the high and low tides would be, all off the top of his head. His world was as small as mine was big, and for a time at least, each of us thought we had it the right size.

Ken Jameson, I found out, was the reporter who asked him the name of his boat. Oliver showed me a picture of him. He looked like Alan Alda. . . .

Oliver told me about him. "Ken wrote for some paper," he said, "in a town 'cross the bay called Big . . . Big, I don't remember. He stayed in a hotel a half hour north of Incline for two days, then he stayed at my house for one day, and then he left. What was the name of that town he come from? Somewhere near D.C. called Big . . . I 'on' 'no', named for a feesh, wadn't it, Big su-um, su-um big . . . wif teef, I 'on' 'no'.

"Anyway, Ken lived in Big Su-um Wif Teef outside a D.C. Said it was only two hours away. He had this bright red car. I'm still waitin' ta git that story he wrote," he said. "It's been two years."

"D.C. still seems like 11,000 miles away to me wherever I am," I told him. "Maybe it got lost in the mail."

Three weeks later, on a cold February afternoon, Oliver came into Noreen's from the post office with his mail. . . . [He] sat across from me at the table with [his dog] Dirt belly up by his right foot, ordered a coffee, handed me some papers and said, "Read'm to me," so I did. It was a manuscript of the story that Mr. Ken wrote about Oliver for his Big Su-um Wif Teef paper. Oliver said it was about time. It read like this:

Oliver builds fearlessly — boats. Every day, small wavelets chop across the water, throwing themselves in vain against the bow of his boat, named The What? No harm done, she will reach the oyster shoal before first light.

"Before first light, the finest time. Two hours between 3 and 5 a.m. Two hours, the width of the edge on the dull axe which splits nights from days.

"The oysters will be there. They've been waiting, attached to the now open shells of the oysters that lived before them. It's calm down there. They don't know about wind or snow or waves. If they could hear, they would hear drowned noises, consonants reduced to vowels, enunciated shouts softened into murmurs, except for the staccato click of the oysterman's hard metallic tongs across the shoal.

"And if the oysters could look up and see through the murky surface of their brackish world, they might see Oliver on the other end of those tongs, his fat face swimming with the waves on the restless surface. They would see him and the bottom of his boat built of cyprus patiently coaxed into the form of a floating shell.

"Oliver Putz is the last of a dying breed of men who practice an unteachable craft, a great dinosaur, The What? a piece of art. . . ."

That's the sort of thing Ken wrote for a living. . . .

"Ga-awd," he took a deep breath with his tongue between his teeth so that he hissed "Dammit. Why don' he jist up an' call m' boat a piece a shit Dinosawr." That was February. It was the only time anyone had seen him get offended. I decided to stay in Incline longer than usual that time.

When the months in 1984 stopped having "r's" in them, Oliver started coming into Noreen's more often, usually carrying one or two thin books in his hands each time. "I'm gonna read," he'd say. Few people paid attention to him when he said this. Few people paid attention to him at all.

By August, things had changed for him. He was a smart man before his mind began failing him. One afternoon, when there was a lull in the conversation, I asked him, "When is the next spring tide?"

He shifted in his chair, and said, "That depends on the next new moon, which is, lemme see here." His lips parted into the first grin he ever made as he pulled a newspaper from a back pocket and rustled it open to the tide tables and moon phases. "It says here, the 25th, high tide at 11:46 a.m." I was surprised and told him so and congratulated him. He read aloud from the newspaper until I was bored. Something was lost from the top of his head.

I came back a week before Labor Day, 1988. . . . He was thin. The same blue pants ballooned like a Zoot Suit. His bald spot shined. His hair stood nearly on end in places. In others, it fell to his ears and shoulders. He reminded me of pictures I saw of Lyndon Johnson during his last days on the ranch. The dog wasn't with him, but she was still alive. He pursed his lips when he saw me, and he said, "Come with me." We rode in his Dodge Dart to his house.

When Oliver opened the front door, Dirt saw me, started barking and ran in circles around this small plastic toy dolphin. As I stooped down to pick it up and throw it for her she growled a growl from the deepest depths of hell.

"Drop it," Oliver warned me, so I dropped it. He had told me what happened when Ken tried to pet the dog years ago, but this was worse. "If you throw that dolphin," he said, "you'll need stitches in your leg. Let me tell you why."

Oliver was waxing eloquent. He scared me.

"You see," he said, "Dirt somehow decided at some point that she had gotten pregnant and had given birth to this squeaky toy. She 'nurses' it. Day before yesterday, she found a stray cat playing with it outside. She broke into a barking howl like beagles do when they curse and she started running circles around the clawing thief. The cat turned around and around to keep its face to the dog, you know, but kitty couldn't keep it up and Dirt finally dove, just like that, at the cat's neck, sunk her teeth into it, shook her head twice, and the cat went dead limp with a broken neck. Dirt dropped the carcass, sniffed it once, picked up the dolphin and wobbled over to a tree where she sat down and tenderly licked the dolphin's plastic coat until it was shiny. I named the dolphin Whaley. Don't touch the dolphin. Now, I have something to show you."

We walked around the back to the pier where The What? rocked in a light breeze, making "plip, plip, plip" sounds. "I've been doing things," he told me as we stepped into the boat's cabin. He reached under what was left of a seat, pulled out a tackle box, opened it, pulled out a manila folder, opened it, pulled out a notebook, opened it to page one, and handed it to me. "Read this," he said.

was the title How I Built The What? by Oliver Putz, and it began: "Remember, you're building a boat, not a watch, so relax, okay?"

While I flipped through it, he told me about loneliness and life at the side of Birch Creek. He was only 53 and he started to fear the stairs, and then he started to fear his age, and when Dirt had Whaley, he came as close as he would to having a family. I never thought he was lonely. "I need more now," he said. "I can't have some chicken necker call me a dinosaur in front of all his readers. I can read

The instructions were as clear as a bell. They were so clear they made me laugh. They were lonely directions, four years in the making.

now." And he could write. The instructions were as clear as a bell. They were so clear they made me laugh. They were lonely directions, four years in the making.

"I'm sending this to that son of a bitch tomorrow," he said as if Ken had just left yesterday. "Did you know that the Latin name for a canvasback is aythya valisineria? It means 'wild celery.'"

He sat on a chair that was a stool because somehow the back had been broken. Lying on its side on the floor was a half-assembled Habitatrail, a fancy hamster cage full of orange tubes. There were books about computers stacked next to the refrigerator, next to piled boxes of model cars and airplanes. On the dining room table there were games — boxes and boxes of old and new games from big toy companies, games I'd never seen before. In front of him, on the kitchen table, was a machine dissected into a million tiny parts. He was skinny, and when he spoke, he sounded like somebody else.

"Oh, hello Paul," he said for the first time, without looking up.

"What the hell are you doing?"

"Just a bit of catching up." As I watched over his shoulder, he screwed a tiny screw into a tiny hole with a tiny Phillips head screwdriver lost in those big, rough, oyster tonging hands of his.

He scribbled some notes on a pad.

"I said, 'What The Hell Are You Doing?'"

He looked up and smiled at me like he did the first time he looked up the tides in the newspaper. "I write Instructions," he said.

"For what?"

"For everything. Did you know I'm a genius? This is a CD player. Alpine needs an up-dated, simplifed manual for their repairmen, so they're having me write it."

Through the kitchen window, I saw an empty dock. "Where's The What??" I asked.

He looked at me, then at the dining room, then the ceiling, then at me again and whispered, "I 'on'no'," and giggled like old men never do.

I looked around one more time. The games, the toys, the machines, they all amounted to much less than The What? They cluttered the house. I didn't come here enough to really care, but somehow I felt that a cruel joke was being played on me. A dose of something I needed every few years was gone. I was being tricked. He told me he never went upstairs. I don't think he slept. He just picked apart these things he received in the mail or possibly from an armored delivery van. He explained them and put them back together again. He told me he made more than most Harvard graduates. I said, "hmmph."

There was a silence — a difficult silence unlike the ones with which we used to pass the afternoons at Noreen's.

Finally, he found something to say. "You hate this," he said. "You hate this because (a) you can't do this, (b) I'm not a dinosaur anymore, (c) you're jealous, and (d) you just don't understand it." He put the screwdriver down and looked at the refrigerator. "Please don't bother trying to understand me, you just keep driving around and around, okay?" There was anger.

I nodded, especially for (d). This wasn't why I came here.

Next Fourth of July I came back. Noreen told me Oliver Putz died of natural causes. I'm sure these terrorists came up with new bombs to make his directions obsolete. He never got around to rewriting the directions to Monopoly, and I never got back around to Incline.

Four Alumni Join Board of Trustees

Three alumni were elected to the Board of Visitors and Governors in May, and a fourth was appointed by the governor this summer. William B. Johnson '40 and Karen Gossard Price '73 won the alumni election, Dietrich H. Steffens '43 was elected by the Board, and Michael Macielag '73 was appointed to a new term.

Johnson, a native of Salisbury, Maryland, and chairman emeritus of Whitman Corporation (formerly IC Industries), first served on the board from 1964 to 1969. He was elected again in 1984 and has served continuously since. He established the Rufus Johnson Scholarship Fund at the College and provided the lead gift for the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center now under construction.

Johnson holds a law degree from the University of Pennsylvania and was awarded an honorary doctor of laws from Washington College in 1975. He is former president and chief executive officer of the Illinois Central Railroad, and former chairman and chief executive officer of IC Industries.

Karen Price of Chestertown is a newcomer to the board, but no stranger to College service. Active in many community organizations, she is past president of the Alumni Association and was a member of the 1989-90 Presidential Search Committee.

She holds a bachelor of arts degree and a master's degree in psychology from Washington College and is an equal employment opportunity specialist with the Maryland State Highway Administration.

Dick Steffens is president of D. H. Steffens & Company, a land engineering firm in LaPlata, Maryland. He has been a member of the Visiting Committee, is active with the Alumni Council, and serves as Class Agent.

Honored by the Maryland Society of Surveyors in 1989, Steffens studied engineering at Purdue University and the Johns Hopkins University. He and his wife, Peggy '46, live in Bryantown, Maryland.

Michael Macielag, president and chief executive officer of Chesapeake Bank & Trust Co. in Chestertown, has served on the Board as an alumni representative since 1984. He has been appointed by Governor Schaefer to a five year term.

Macielag is former assistant to the president and acting director of development at WC and past president of the Alumni Association.

Two New Alumni Chapters Celebrate

Two new alumni chapters debuted with events this spring.

In May the New York chapter celebrated "The Best of Both Worlds: Friends from Chestertown, Food from Zabar's." Alumni picnicked in Central Park and cheered WC runners in the Alamo Alumni Run.

Later that month Boston alumni gathered at Fenway Park to watch the Orioles beat the Red Sox.

Presidents of the new chapters are Bill Mortimer '82 and Francie Burnet '84, New York, and Tom Tansi '85, Boston.

CLASS NOTES

'31 Elizabeth "Pet" Mace Farver is "grateful to be a healthy octogenarian," living for the last 50 years in the house that was built for her in Cambridge, MD. Her interests are projects that involve education, church work, local history, and family genealogy. For 25 years she was a member of the board of the Children's Home Foundation of the Eastern Shore. Pet also enjoys reading, keeping scrapbooks on numerous subjects, traveling, and watching television, especially Orioles baseball games.

A Planned Gift Lasts Forever

Since the Roaring Twenties, the annual cost of a Washington College education has been equivalent to the purchase price of a new automobile. Car fashions and technology have changed — from Ford Model T's to Mazda Miata's — but the ingredients of a liberal arts education have stayed the same. Today, Washington College offers a committed teaching faculty, a formal curriculum which encourages students to reason and value their cultural inheritance, first-rate facilities in a beautiful campus setting, and the traditions of a noble mission.

Washington College is a part of you: a shining memory of your youth, and one of the principles around which you built your life. Now more than ever, the College needs your support as it begins its third century. Our future depends upon alumni and friends who make provisions in their estate plans. Scholarships, faculty enhancement funds, and book endowments are all urgently needed, but cannot be provided by tuition payments alone. Won't you help? Unlike a car, an education lasts a lifetime. A planned gift lasts forever.

For information about estate and tax planning for Washington College (including ways in which you can donate your car), write Martin Williams, Director of Development, Washington College, Chestertown, MD 21620. Phone 1-800-422-1782, ext. 398.

community banks, locally owned and operated, dedicated to meeting community needs. Mike is president and CEO of Chesapeake Bank and Trust Co., a $43 million community bank in Chestertown.

'75 Jeanna Gallo asks if anyone ever hears from Tom Middleton? "I lived with him, Jane Meilink, Wynne Wooley, and Karen Thompson in New York in the late 1970s. We've all lost touch with Tom since he moved to Hoboken. I just attended T.J. Finkbinder's '74 surprise 40th birthday party. He is a drama and English teacher now, still directing and acting. Nancy Knuth '77 is getting married and moving to Canada. Karyn Thompson '78 became a film/video editor and married and moved to Tennessee. Joel Elins is a Broadway stage manager (he worked on the last play DeNiro did on B'way). I'd love to hear from John DiAmico. The last time I saw Linda Hamilton '78 was at my surprise birthday party in NY before she went out to 'the coast.' James Cameron has turned her into an absolute amazon for Terminator 2."

Phil Vogler, an attorney specializing in civil litigation with Montgomery, McCracken, Walker & Rhodes in Philadelphia, has tried cases in Kansas City, San Francisco, Washington, DC, Denver, and Seattle. He keeps a 28' sailboat on the Bohemia River.

She spent two years working at the Johns Hopkins Hospital as a staff nurse on a liver and kidney surgical transplant floor. Since 1989 she has worked for the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine as a research nurse with a group of patients that have a rare genetic illness known as Huntingtons Disease. She would like to hear from Kathleen DeFlaun.

Roberta Baumann Gardullo and her two-year-old son, Alexander, traveled to Tokyo last spring. The fall found her family in East and West Germany and this summer they traveled to Cancun and Ixtapa, Mexico. "When my husband, Mike, can get away from his job at Standard Charter Bank in Baltimore, he comes too. I encourage parents to travel with their children. It has never been a burden, rather, fun, fun, fun. Travel makes me a better social studies teacher too." Roberta would like to hear from Linda Maddox, Rick Norvell '81, Colleen O'Neill '78, and Kimberly Harquail before Reunion in May.

After graduation Virginia "Ginger" Kurapka spent a year working in the library at Johns Hopkins University. She then returned to WC for a year as assistant to president Douglass Cater. An extremely cold winter drove her to California where she entered graduate school in international studies at the Monterey Institute. Before completing her studies she was offered a position as a foreign service officer with the U.S. Department of State. Since joining the Foreign Service she has served in Haiti (when they kicked out the Duvalier), Indonesia, and Hamburg, Germany. "I was fortunate enough to be here when the wall came down. What a rush!"

Thomas G. Narbeth '71 of Easton, PA, died May 20, 1991. He was head of technical services at Skillman library, Lafayette College. Previously he worked in the libraries at SUNY and at George Washington University. He is survived by his wife, Pamela Seneff Narbeth '69, one son, and one sister.

Deaths

Gilbert V. Byron '23, one of the Chesapeake Bay's most prolific and well-known authors, died of congestive heart failure on June 25, 1991. His best known work, The Lord's Oyster, is about growing up in Chestertown in the early 1900s. He was the author of 11 books, the last published in 1990. He had no family.

Samuel S. Nicholson '29 of Riva, MD, died of a heart attack on February 3, 1991. He is survived by his wife, Dorothy.

Louisa Bowen Matthews '31 of Baltimore died on July 12, 1991. She is survived by a sister, Bunny Bowen Rasin '36.

William Edwin Freeny '31 of Seminole, FL, died on April 25, 1991. He was a past chairman of the mathematics department at Woodlawn Senior High School in Baltimore County.

Joseph Bringham '33 of near Wilmington, DE, died on April 7, 1991. Active in banking for 40 years, Mr. Bringham retired as president of the Artisan's Savings Bank of Wilmington in 1972. He was active on the board of directors and its executive committee until his death. He is survived by 2 daughters, one brother, 7 grandchildren, and 5 great-grandchildren.

Students Should Play A Role In The Master Plan

by Kevin "Sparky" Kelly '92

When asked to write my opinion on what the Campaign for Excellence has meant to me, I remembered the first time I arrived at Washington College on a hot August day in 1988. My initial impression was: "Look at all this mud!" It was everywhere!

I later wondered where the "excellence" was to be found in this quagmire. After a while I got used to it. It seemed to become as much a part of the College as the Elm. The mud was something that was always there, and could be enjoyed sometimes — after particularly hard rains we would slide about in it for fun.

There comes a time, however, when the freshman's view on things changes as he trudges his way through the years and the mud. The mud starts to represent less of an inconvenience and becomes a sign of change. To me mud will always be an indication of progress, of a new beginning. Where there is mud there is one facet of the Master Plan on its way to completion. Some facets are completed more slowly than others, but the fact of the matter is that something is taking place — something that is new and that is bound to make this college more dynamic.

The Master Plan has given us more than just mud. It has given us the Decker Science Center, where students use the modern lab facilities to explore and learn. It has given us the Casey Academic Center, where students use language and computer classrooms to further enhance these most necessary skills. This year the mud and the Master Plan will bring forth the Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center, a place for students to practice the art of being fit and healthy. Soon, when the new Student Center is completed, students will have a larger place to relax, recreate, and socialize. And of course we cannot forget the stately Cater Walk or the new grassy mall behind Bill Smith, both the result of efforts to continue to beautify the campus.

It is a shame, though, that this Campaign for Excellence that has so impacted the students has not encouraged them to have more of a say about its plans or direction. As these very projects were taking shape, the students were expected to appreciate, or at least to accept, the changes to their environment. While some changes may indeed benefit us, others have simply confused us. For nine months of the year, we consider this campus our home. I, for one, would like to know why my backyard, where I used to play ball, was turned into a small forest. I would like to be able to prevent such things from happening again. As students, we are able to give valuable insights to the planning of improvements to our surroundings.

Although the lack of student input to the Campaign for Excellence thus far can be attributed to lack of prior involvement, to be fair, we students have not all been ready or anxious to make the effort to communicate our feelings to the administration.

Throughout last year I attended several well-publicized open campus fo-rumms about the renovations to the Student Center and other projects and was disappointed to see only a few fellow students there. While the input of these few was good, it was embarrassing to have so few peers interested in and attending something that directly affected them.

The administration and students both have been negligent in this matter. The administration has failed to include students in the planning stages. Students have failed because, once presented with the opportunity to make an impact, we have displayed our apathy. Both failures have robbed us all of potential ideas and the chance to work together.

Fortunately, this negligence may not last. The Student Government Association saw the need to have student representation in the Campaign for Excellence and other future changes.

The Board of Visitors and Governors' Buildings and Grounds Committee has eagerly agreed to add a student to its membership. This student will be able to inform the student body of the changes being considered and provide feedback to the Board regarding student opinion.

The administration has made its first move toward including the students. Now the students must respond by seeking and providing feedback to the issues at hand. It is their chance to become more involved and to act instead of react.

The Master Plan is not complete. There are still many opportunities for students to have their say. The Campaign for Excellence has been paid for through the generous efforts of Jim Price and Alonzo G. Decker. Perhaps their efforts will inspire the student body to actively and energetically begin to make their contributions.

The State Of The College: 1990-91 In Review

by President Charles H. Trout

When I came to Washington College on July 1, 1990, I began with a 7:30 a.m. breakfast for all members of the buildings and grounds staff, and later in the day I hosted a luncheon for secretarial, clerical, and technical employees. One year to the day, I held an anniversary breakfast and luncheon for these same colleagues, and a day later I dined with all members of the administrative staff. On each of these occasions, I asked how many of my guests either had been married or were presently married. Most raised their hands.

Why this exercise? The answer is simple. If one has been married, one knows about honeymoons. One knows about the idealized version, and one knows about actualities. In the idealized version, all is sweetness and light — roses (at least) and maybe even magnolia blossoms. In the more realistic version, there tends to be a certain, shall we say, unevenness — e.g. “Why are you using my razor?”

So it is with presidential honeymoons, which brings me closer to the point. It is said that all presidents are accorded honeymoons, and I eagerly looked forward to mine. What I discovered, though, was that your 24th president’s first year more closely resembled not the idealized romantic love nest of fiction but the ups and downs (“Where did you put my toothbrush?”) that most people experience. (“And by the way, why can’t I order beluga caviar without looking at the right-hand side of the menu?”)

Authors are not supposed to give away their punch line at the very outset. Mine, as you will see shortly, is that 1990-91 was a great year for the College. Before I reach this point, however, let me say in all candor that there were some not-so-great moments. In sharing them with you, I am assuming that all readers of the Washington College Magazine are of stronger fibre than Mrs. General in Charles Dickens’ Little Dorritt. Mrs. General, as Dickens fans among you will recall, was the sort of person who mastered an elaborate method for insulating herself from all unpleasant aspects of Victorian life.

Mrs. General was not to be told of anything shocking. Accidents, miseries, and offenses were never to be mentioned before her. Passion was to go to sleep in the presence of Mrs. General, and blood was to change to milk and water. The little that was left in the world, when all these deductions were made, it was Mrs. General’s province to vanish. In that formation process of hers, she dipped the smallest of brushes into the largest of pots and varnished the surface of every object that came into consideration. The more cracked it was, the more Mrs. General varnished it.

Assuming that there are few Mrs. or Mr. Generals among you, I am encouraged to mention some of the brushfires that disrupted my blissful honeymoon — and then a few very much more significant concerns I gradually began to identify.

Although the testimony of security officers, local police, and those who work in Student Affairs was unanimous in expressing their conviction that substantial progress was made in reducing substance abuse among our undergraduates (something to which I am wholly dedicated), we were not immune. Late on an autumn night, visitors from another college crashed a party in Dorchester Hall, a fight broke out, and a student lost part of his ear. “The Night of the Great Ear Bite” now belongs to College lore.

And then there was the lacrosse incident. On the way home in late February from scrimmages with Duke and North Carolina State universities, ten varsity players, seven of them starters, loaded beer into their van. A high-speed chase (the clocking was 93 m.p.h.) with North Carolina State Police ensued. To make a long story short, none of the ten played for Washington College thereafter, and a very likely national championship went down the drain. I received 125 letters on the subject, and 123 of them were supportive. Still, I felt very badly for the players and for all who had pinned their hopes to what was to have been a great season.

Toward the end of my first 12 months, another athletic issue erupted, and this one pertained to the tennis program. Despite the extraordinary records the men’s team achieved under Coach Fred Wyman and the women's squad amassed under Holly Bramble, I received and accepted a recommendation that we move to coaches who are full-time members of the Athletic Department. As many of you know, in the late 1980s an extended review team recommended that as resources might permit, we should move in this direction, and we have done so in crew, swimming, and soccer. Now we have taken that step in tennis. At the core of the matter, institutional control over our varsity programs was a crucial consideration in shifting toward full-time staff. Indeed, the issue of institutional control bubbled to the surface when the tennis program was reviewed: it seemed appropriate to take a look at the program, because the College in 1989 received so-called "secondary sanctions" from the National Collegiate Athletic Association's Committee on Infractions. The current files were turned over to legal counsel, and I was informed that we were required to self-report further possible violations. This has now been done, and at press time we await the NCAA's assessment. My own examination of the files leads me to the conclusion that no past or present student knowingly violated NCAA rules. Whether the NCAA will see it this way is something we cannot now know.

There were still other not-so-great moments. On October 15th Dave Wheelan, our estimable Vice President for Development and College Relations, accepted a position with The Nature Conservancy, and we were out one Vice President. Sherry Magill, the President's Deputy, accepted a position with the Jessie Ball duPont Foundation, and we were out a second Vice President. After six years at the helm as Dean of the College and Provost, Elizabeth Bear elected to take a terminal sabbatical, and we were out a third Vice President. Some honeymoon!

There were even more important disruptions to conjugal bliss, and they remain as long-term issues for the College. The State of Maryland's fiscal woes are no secret, and our Christmas present from Annapolis was a $100,000 cut in state aid. Happily, even deeper cuts were forestalled, but as we look to the future the prospects for robust state and federal aid do not look promising. Income from endowment was also down, and for a scary 30 days the possibility of spilling red ink looked all too real: clearly, attention must be given in the future to the management of our endowment portfolio, now close to $20,000,000.

To add to the fun, the initial yield on accepted students for the Class of '95 was under target, and the presidential palms began to perspire.

To cap the year, June was featured by the first appearance of brown leaves on the great ceremonial Elm, descendant of the tree under which George Washington stood when he took command of the Continental Army. As Pat Trams reported to the Alumni Council, it was not long before the Elm registered a flat EKG. In early August, the remnants of the tree were toppled. So much for honeymoons.

The entering class . . . shows ability levels as high as ever, and it is also worth noting that 10 percent of the class consists of minorities, the highest figure in the College's history.

But not to worry! In so many ways it was, in fact, a wonderful year, and one needs not to be an incurable romantic to come to this conclusion.

"What, Mr. President, is your evidence?" A fair question.

The budget balanced. Stanford's deficit was a rollicking $95,000,000, Yale's was $11,000,000, and the American Association of Colleges recently reported that more than half of all academic institutions ended fiscal year 1990-91 in arrears. Washington College, in contrast, ended the year with a surplus — a very small surplus, to be sure, but positive numbers nonetheless. No fiscal sleight of hand was involved. For instance, we fully funded our plant renewal and replacement account, and even though budget managers were asked to defer certain purchases from mid-May through June 30th, the prevalent view is that no one was truly crippled.

At press time, it appears we will be welcoming 218 new students to Washington College and that we will begin the year with an undergraduate count of roughly 850. Given that our budget target is 840, I believe we are going to be O.K. — not smug, but in reasonable shape. As a nation we are, as most of you know, at the bottom of a demographic trough, and the next four years are going to be challenging, to say the least. When the number of college-age students recovers in the 1990s, we will be able to breathe a sigh of relief, but probably not until then. The entering class, incidentally, shows ability levels as high as ever, and it is also worth noting that 10 percent of the class consists of minorities, the highest figure in the College's history. Since diversification of the student body is one of our most important priorities, this is a happy outcome. It should be added that in the year ahead we intend to take further initiatives in respect to minority recruitment, and we also intend to embark upon a quest for students from abroad.

I would also claim that in general, 1990-91 was a year most faculty will remember favorably.

Recruitment of new colleagues went extremely well, and our ability to hire our first choices, which in most cases we did, is a salient measure of where we stand among national liberal arts colleges.

Moreover, the scholarly productivity of the faculty strikes me as impressive (see "Faculty Achievements," page 37), and so does the recognition my colleagues have received from outside — a second Fulbright for Professor Michael Malone, an NSF grant to Professor Rosette Roat, PEN membership for Professor Robert Day, a Dumbarton Oaks fellowship for Professor Jeanette Sherbondy, a National Endowment for the Humanities summer grant to Professor Kevin Brien, and invitations to our faculty from a number of learned societies to give papers. This list is too long to include here. Indeed, the scholarly bent of the faculty is reflected by a vote that replaced the old Faculty Handbook statement to the effect that "properly understood, scholarship is an adjunct to teaching," to a bold statement that scholarship is "important." In short, Washington College seeks teacher-scholars of high quality.

In addition, the faculty was heartened by the successful resolution of a long-simmering donnybrook over proposed changes in the trustee By-Laws. These changes pertain to two matters that most readers will find arcane but that are of considerable importance to those who teach at Washington College — namely, what procedures would be followed in the event that the College, for reasons of financial exigency, would have to reduce the size of the faculty, and what procedures would be followed should the time come when an entire program, or department, would be axed? Again to make a long story short, these barnacles on the Ship of State have been removed. Furthermore, proposals to institute written annual evaluations, rigorous review after three years of teaching, and the extension to six years of the probationary period prior to tenure were overwhelmingly approved by votes of the faculty.

It is my belief that the faculty, and students as well, found stimulating the programmatic riches that Washington College's wildly successful Campaign for Excellence made possible. There was a time when lectures, concerts, dramatic productions, and symposia at Washington College occurred once a week at best. With the advent of the McLain endowment (nine lectures and two symposia), the Goldstein Program in Public Affairs (26 activities in all), and the inauguration of the Wingate and Goodfellow lectures, the weekly calendar was chock-a-block full. When one factors in our ambitious concert series (soon to launch its 40th season with the Juilliard String Quartet), the ever-successful William James Forum, the always ambitious College Theater productions, the activities of various theme houses (International House in particular), and various departmental lectures, the cultural riches that have come our way resemble those of a college many times our size.

The year also witnessed a number of positives among our undergraduates — a Fulbright, a strong record in admission to graduate school, and an extremely effective Student Government Association. The S.G.A. played a role in establishing a more responsible recycling program, set up a Council on Undergraduate Research to fund student academic projects of particular distinction, and supported a daily newsletter, WAC Happenings, that improved campus communication. The Senior Class officers were marvelous to work with, and the Senior Class Council raised $4,000 for their alma mater. To my delight, students plunged pell-mell into volunteer service in record numbers, facilitated in part by the establishment of an umbrella organization called Hands Out. In addition, approval of a new, long-sought position, namely a Director of Student Activities, augurs well for the future, and in the year ahead we will work to make Washington College less of a suitcase college on weekends. Finally, it is worth noting that at least at this writing, our retention rate for the classes of 1992, 1993, and 1994 has increased.

Although there were administrative losses, there were also administrative gains. Significant newcomers have given us great strength — Shawn Lyons, our Vice President for Development and College Relations; John Taylor, our Acting Dean of the College for 1991-92; our new Director of Financial Aid, Ellyn Taylor (soon to be Ellyn Levine); Joseph Holt, (Washington College '83) my new Executive Assistant; Mary Lee Creager, our new Director of Continuing Education; and Steven Johnson, a welcome addition to Kevin Coveney's admissions staff.

The year also witnessed a number of positives among our undergraduates — a Fulbright, a strong record in admission to graduate school, and an extremely effective Student Government Association.

Thanks to reorganization in Gene Hessey's office, we at last have created a position for a personnel officer — about time in an institution with some 297 employees! The post has been filled by Susan Davis.

Although it could be argued that these many changes are disruptive, my sense is that the balance between continuity and change is just about right. Meanwhile, I am grateful to have found on board so many good people who are staying on with renewed enthusiasm.

The past year has also seen further strides in the implementation of our Master Plan and in additions to the physical plant. Even as I write, Gibson Avenue and the mammoth parking lot behind Bunting and Bill Smith, both of them gone, are being landscaped. The new parking lot contiguous to Kibler Field is finished. Moreover, we moved into the wondrous new Casey Academic Center back in mid-January, and construction of the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center is on schedule.

Thanks to the work of Tai Soo Kim Associates, we have an impressive new three-dimensional model of the campus with recommendations for the renovation of William Smith Hall and the construction of a new, 25,000 square foot classroom building. The Committee on Buildings and Grounds has been hard at work on this potential project and will report to the Board in September.

Then, too, there were ceremonial aspects to the year that further contributed to good feelings — Professor Nathan Smith's Fall Convocation Address before a packed house, the October 6th inauguration festivities, Kirk Johnson's memorable remarks about his grandfather at the Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center groundbreaking ceremony, Washington's Birthday Convocation, the joyous dedication of the Casey Academic Center, and thanks to Will Baker's inspiring address and miraculous break with the weather, a perfect Commencement.

To top it off, we ended the year with gifts that totaled $4.7 million, the third highest amount in the College's history — and this is the first post-campaign year and in a sluggish economy. Best of all, the number of alumni who contributed increased by more than 200: WE BEAT

PRINCETON!!! For the few of you who are wondering about this reference, our final appeal of the year centered on Washington College's standing among the 3,300 institutions of higher education in the United States. Top 20 ranking, yes, but there was Princeton, four-tenths of a percentage point above us. Could we beat them? Absolutely! With 55.3 percent of all alumni standing up to be counted, we solidified our top 20 ranking and moved ahead of the dreaded Tigers. Who will be the next victim? Stay tuned.

Yes, on balance, it was a good year. As it turns out, honeymoons Chesterton-style are special. How I hope that 1991-92 will give me yet another!

Faculty Achievements

GARRY E. CLARKE, professor and chair of the music department, played Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 27, K.595 with the Talbot Chamber Orchestra in Easton and Salisbury. He published two articles in the magazine Design for Arts in Education: "Essential American Music: A Little List" (May/June 1990) and "Our Middle Ages: A View of Today" (May/June 1991.) This summer, Clarke studied "Jazz in American Culture" at M.I.T.

THOMAS COUSINEAU, professor of English, received a faculty enhancement grant to attend a Samuel Beckett Colloquium hosted by the Principality of Monaco in the Princess Grace Irish Library. He read his paper "Beneath Representation: On Staging Beckett's Plays" in Monaco and is at work on a book about Beckett's trilogy of novels.

ROBERT DAY's short story, "My Father Swims His Horse At Last," was published as part of the Best American Short Story Award Collection in Tri-Quarterly Magazine last fall. Several of Day's essays on travel and education were published by the Washington Post Sunday Magazine, and several are forthcoming in Smithsonian, Modern Maturity, and the Kansas Quarterly. He traveled extensively through the West this summer, and is at work on an essay on the demise of the American bison. He received a prestigious nomination to attend the PEN International conference this fall in Vienna.

COLIN C. DICKSON has been promoted to full professor of French. His article, "Théorie et pratique de la clôture: l'exemple de Maupassant dans 'La Maison Tellier,'" was published in the October 1990 issue of The French Review.

ROBERT FALLAW, professor and chair of history, delivered two addresses—one on "The Civil War Era" before a group of Princeton alumni of the Eastern Shore, and another on "Indians of the Eastern Shore" before the Upper Eastern Shore Genealogical Society.

GERALDINE FISHER, ALICE B. GOODFELLOW, and GAIL TUBBS, College writing tutors, presented a panel on the College's Sophomore Writing Obligation at the April meeting of the Mid-Atlantic Writing Centers Association. Tubbs' article, "A Case for Teaching Grammar to Writers," was published in The Writing Lab Newsletter.

ROSEMARY FORD, assistant professor of biology, has been granted tenure. With a faculty enhancement grant from Washington College and support from Crop Genetics International, she studied symbiotic bacteria in grasses this summer. She presented a paper on "Recovery of Clavibacter spp. cytodontis from overwintering parts of Bermuda grass" at the Potomac Division meeting of the American Phytopathological Society.

DAVY McCALL published a report of the archaeological investigations of his Cannon Street home, the former house of free black laborer Thomas Cuff, in North American Archaeologist. Wade P. Catts of University of Delaware co-authored the article.

J. DAVID NEWELL's article, "Assisted Suicide and the Ethics of Self-Preservation," is scheduled to appear in the December 1991 issue of the interdisciplinary journal on hospital ethical and legal issues HEC Forum. A second article on "Ethical Issues in Prison Administration" was published in the spring 1991 issue of Federal Prison Bureau Journal.

SEAN O CONNOR has designed a model humanities program for use throughout the Maryland school system entitled "Educating for Democracy in the Modern World." The model program, developed for the Maryland Humanities Council, is based on the high school faculty seminars O Connor conducted at Washington College. The program explores values in American life through critical reading of texts and analytical discussion, and is designed to assist Maryland educators in relating their professional lives and teaching to the broad issue of the responsibilities of citizenship. O Connor will present a two-hour demonstration of the model at the Maryland Humanities Council conference in December, and again for a small group of teachers and administrators in February.

JASON RUBIN, lecturer in drama, has been awarded his Ph.D. from New York University's Department of Performance Studies in February 1991.

JOACHIM J. SCHOLZ, associate professor of German, has been awarded an $8,000 grant to continue his archival research on the German writer August Scholtis in Germany. He spent two months this summer at the archives in Dortmund. The project will result in a four-volume edition of the author's selected works.

This spring, JEANETTE SHERBONDY, assistant professor of anthropology, presented her paper, "Water Ideology in Inca Ethnogenesis," at the annual meeting of the American Ethnological Society. She traveled to New Orleans in July to attend a meeting of the International Congress of Americanists, where she presented a paper on Archaeoastronomy of Incas. She was awarded a Fellowship in Pre-Columbian Studies for 1991-92 at Dumbarton Oaks in Washington, D.C.

In a joint project with JEANETTE SHERBONDY, GEORGE R. SHIVERS, professor of Spanish, is working on a translation of a 16th century Spanish chronicle by Juan de Betanzos entitled Suma y Narracion de los Incas. Shivers' translation of Ariel Dorfman's collection of literary essays was published in May by Duke University Press under the title Someone Writes to the Future. He also attended the International Congress Of Americanists meeting this summer.

In August, KAREN LYNN SMITH, associate professor of physical education, presented two workshops at the International Congress of Health, Physical Education, Recreation and Dance in Limerick, Ireland, and then attended the International Olympic Academy in Olympia, Greece. Earlier, she attended the U.S. Olympic Academy XV in Fort Collins, Colorado.

GEORGE SPILICH, chair of the psychology department, has been promoted to full professor. He continues to conduct research on the effects of smoking, the effects of industrial solvents, and the effects of diabetes on memory and cognition. He authored three articles related to his research projects and made several lecture/presentations throughout the year, including two student co-authored paper presentations at the Eastern Psychological Association's Annual Meeting in April. He was in Germany in March presenting "Cognitive Change in Alzheimer's Disease: New Perspectives" before the Department of Psychiatry at the University of Wurzburg, and in April he was keynote speaker with a talk entitled "Memory Research in the Real World" at the second annual Intercollegiate Undergraduate Research Day at St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia. He spent the summer working on the computerized brain mapper and editing a book, Neurodevelopment, Cognition, And Dementia, for publication by Berkhauser-Boston.

REPORT OF GIFTS

THE 1782 SOCIETY of WASHINGTON COLLEGE

THE 1782 SOCIETY recognizes a group of benefactors committed to the stewardship of Washington College. Carrying on a tradition established in 1782 by George Washington, who donated the generous sum of fifty guineas, members of the 1782 Society provide the leadership and financial support that is critical to the continuing vitality of the College.

Individual membership in the 1782 Society is awarded in one of four gift clubs ranging from the $1,000 entry level to $10,000 and up. Corporate and foundation donors of $1,000 or more are also extended membership in the Society.

The College extends its deepest appreciation to the members of the 1782 Society for their generosity.

George Washington Society

The George Washington Society was created to ensure that future leaders of Washington College will have the financial resources to provide excellent educational opportunities for students. The George Washington Society recognizes those alumni, faculty, and friends who have made a bequest or planned gift to the College. Members receive a Scroll of Membership, and their names will be inscribed on the George Washington Society Roll of Honor, to be displayed at the College.

DONOR'S PROFILE:

ED NORDBERG '82

HOME: Washington, DC.

GIVING LEVEL: 1782 Society.

PROFILE: Armed with an MBA from Loyola College in Baltimore and a JD from Georgetown University, Ed is an attorney with the DC law firm of Williams & Connolly, practicing in the areas of corporate and securities law.

ON THE WC EXPERIENCE: "We live and work in a complex and rapidly changing world — one that demands continual growth and learning. Washington College combines a balanced grounding in the liberal arts with myriad opportunities for interpersonal development, an educational process which yields graduates who are well prepared to succeed in today's world. It also, I think, broadens one's view of what it means to be successful."

COLLEGE YEARS: "There is not one specific memory I could pin down as being the 'best,' although the 1982 lacrosse season — highlighted by WC's first ever victory over Navy — was very special. I had a lot of good times at WC and I made some great friends with whom I am still in close contact. I think that is the most memorable reflection of my college years."

WHY OTHERS SHOULD GIVE: "Washington College provides the foundation for a lifetime of learning. We should all be concerned with ensuring its continued vitality."
